Two boys and a memorable experience

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Set on the tiny island of Mauritius in the Indian Ocean, The Last Brother (Graywolf Press) is a haunting and beautifully written book by French-Mauritian writer Nathacha Appanah.

Raj, the 70-year-old narrator, looks back with guilt at an experience that happened to a Jewish boy he befriended 60 years earlier at the tail end of World War II.

Raj's childhood has been anything but happy. His two brothers died during a vicious, devastating rainstorm. His father is an alcoholic who frequently beats him and his mother.

One day, Raj is hiding outside the prison camp where his father works as a guard. Through the barbed-wire fence, Raj gets his first look at the inmates as they're led to the courtyard for fresh air.

The prisoners are not the "dangerous ones: runaways, robbers and bad men" that his father warned him about. To his surprise, they are white and include women and children.

Raj is drawn to one of them, a boy around his age who Raj believes was looking back at him through the barbed wire fence.

The inmates are Jewish exiles from Europe who fled the Holocaust in 1940 on a ship bound for Haifa, but were turned back by the British. Instead, they were sent to Mauritius where they spent the rest of the war.

But Raj doesn't know any of this. Living on this island far from Europe, he has no idea there is even a war on.

After one particularly brutal beating, his father takes him to the prison hospital explaining to the doctors and police that he fell out of a tree.

In the prison hospital, he meets many of the Jewish refugees, including the boy, David Stein, who is suffering from malaria.

To Raj, naïve and innocent, Jewishness may as well be an illness, for why else would they be in hospital? He is amused by the star around David's neck. Why would David name a star after himself, he wonders?

Raj and David become close friends, but after Raj is released from hospital, they are separated, until a cyclone ravages the hospital and David escapes.

The two boys unite and embark on a fateful and tragic story that Raj will remember forever.

The Last Brother is a moving book that touches upon several themes, especially the loss of childhood. Appanah and the English translator, Geoffrey Strachan, have a beautiful way with description, as in this scene when Raj first sees David behind the prison fence:

"What I saw first was his hair, that magnificent mop of it, which floated around his head but which was certainly his and his alone, in a way that nothing has ever belonged to me, those curls hiding his brow, and his way of advancing stiffly, not limping, for all the world as if it were made of wood and iron and his machinery had not been oiled for quite some while."

Unfortunately, these long, poetic sentences can sometimes be cumbersome and slow the pace down, distracting the reader.

That aside, The Last Brother is a moving and intelligent novel that tells a unique and original Holocaust-themed story.

Patinkin leads off Jewish theatre's new season

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Performances by Mandy Patinkin and Theodore Bikel are two of the highlights of the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's upcoming fifth season.

Patinkin, who's won both Tony and Emmy awards, will star in the season's Sept. 17 launch of Mamaloshen (Mother Tongue). Bikel makes a return visit to Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company (HGJTC) in Visiting Mr. Green, after wowing Toronto audiences in Sholom Aleichem: Laughter Through Tears in 2009.

The star-studded season's other offerings include the Off-Broadway success, Circumcise Me, the true story of Jewish comedian Yisrael Campbell, born Christopher Campbell, a Catholic, and a new play by Canadian playwright Hannah Moscovitch, The Children's Republic, about Dr. Janusz Korczak. Korczak ran an orphanage in Warsaw for Jewish children and stayed with them on a train to Treblinka. A co-production with the Tarragon Theatre, the play stars Peter Hutt.

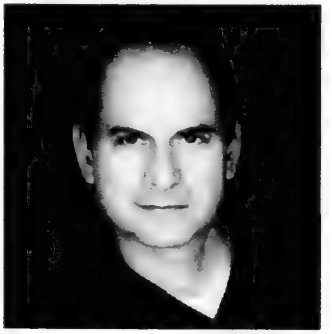
The season culminates with Neil Simon's Pulitzer Prize and Tony Award-winning play Lost in Yonkers, starring Marion Ross, who played the mother in the 1970s hit TV sitcom Happy Days. The play also stars Linda Kash and David Eisner, in his HGJTC acting debut. Eisner shares co-artistic director duties with Avery Saltzman.

"There are several highlights this year," Eisner says. "It is incredible for us to open up with Mandy Patinkin, who is a world-class performer. Marion Ross is this wonderful, iconic television star from the States. To have her to do this Pulitzer Prize play, and have me get my feet wet and be in it, is a thrill as well. I have only done a few plays – mostly my experience has been in film and television," he says.

"Another highlight is doing a Canadian play, a co-production with such a prestigious Canadian theatre company as the Tarragon. This has been in our radar for three years now, so for it to come to fruition is a very special project for us. It will be part of Holocaust Education Week."

The company is excited to have Bikel back. Eisner says Bikel has been a great spokesperson for Jewish theatre, and is grateful that he has helped HGJTC in many ways.

This season, the HGJTC becomes a resident company at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts in Toronto. "It is a real thrill to have our name on the side of the St. Lawrence Centre, to have a Jewish theatre company in one of the major theatres in Toronto," Eisner says.



David Eisner

Also returning is the Conversations on the Green series, hosted by Ralph Benmergui. This year, actor and comedian Eugene Levy; the president and CEO of Postmedia Network, Paul Godfrey; AIDS activist Stephen Lewis and Marion Ross will be talkin' the talk.

"We have celebrities talk about their career through the lens of growing up Jewish. Except for Marion Ross, who isn't Jewish, but she's going to talk about Jewish culture and how that influenced her life and career," Eisner says. "To have Eugene Levy, Paul Godfrey, Stephen Lewis and Marion Ross, it really rounds out a great fifth anniversary season for us."

Eisner credits the Jewish community, especially the Harold Green family, for the success of the company. "They say it takes a village to raise a child – it also takes a village to raise a theatre company to life. It is a partnership with the audience, and the audience is growing," he says.

"The people who come are our best advocates. They love what they see. We have about 1,000 subscribers, and this season we hope to double that. Phones are ringing steadily."

Milman thrilled about first Israeli performance

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

HERZLIYA — Sophie Milman, the Juno Award-winning jazz sensation, performed in Israel recently for the first time since she moved to Canada when she was 16.

Barely able to contain her excitement, 28-year-old Milman, who made aliyah to Israel from Russia when she was a young girl, told the capacity crowd at the Zappa Club in Herzliya that she wasn't able to put her joy into words.

"I'm so excited to be here and it really feels like my first show... To come back to Israel is really amazing, I can't even explain it," Milman said in Hebrew, drawing attention to her barely there Russian accent.

In an interview following her performance, Milman said that she was so excited about performing in Israel for the first time since she moved with her family to Canada that she "started freaking. In the hotel room I couldn't find my shoes, I couldn't find my dress."

Milman, who performed with her trio – pianist Paul Shrofel, bassist Kieran Overs and drummer Jim Doxas – as well as veteran Israeli saxophonist Peter Wertheimer, added that her gig in Israel was so special to her because "so much of my identity was formed here. I consider myself very much a Canadian at this point, but Israel and the people here are very close to my heart."

In fact, many friends and family members she left behind in Israel, who had never seen her perform before, were in the audience.

Sophie Milman

Despite having toured throughout North America, Europe and Asia, it wasn't until she connected with Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU) national director, Rami Kleinmann, that she was able to arrange this homecoming.

Milman's husband, Casey Chisick, an entertainment lawyer, who also worked as executive producer of her Juno Award-winning 2007 album, Make Someone Happy, her 2009 album, Take Love Easy, and her 2008 concert DVD, Live in Montreal, arranged for Milman to come to Israel to perform and to promote Hebrew U and the Institute of Medical Research Israel-Canada (IMRIC), which fosters interdisciplinary partnerships between Canadian and Israeli scientists and researchers.

CFHU, a non-profit organization that promotes and raises funds for Hebrew U, which hosted a delegation of Canadian friends last week, arranged for Milman to perform at the Zappa Club on June 18, at the Hebrew U convocation and during board of governors meetings the following evening, as well as a Canadian awards dinner during which Israeli researchers and students received scholarships and awards donated by CFHU supporters.

"Within six months, we made it here. I'm so grateful to this organization for bringing me here. I really have a lot of respect for what Hebrew University does, the medical and technological advancements," Milman said.

She said that in the months before she arrived in Israel, while recording her not-yet-released album in New York, she couldn't stop thinking about her show in Herzliya.

"It went better than I even imagined... It's very rare that when you're on stage, you're breathing together with the audience. I really felt that," she said.

The sexy songstress, with her trademark smoky voice, serenaded her Israeli audience in English, French, Hebrew and Russian, with jazz standards including Day In, Day Out and Take Love Easy.

Milman also surprised the audience with covers of Bruce Springsteen's I'm On Fire and Joni Mitchell's Be Cool.

Before she sang Be Cool, she said, "I love Israel, I love Russia, but Canada was very good to me and I wanted to record something Canadian and this is the song we chose."

In an intimate moment, Milman dedicated a song called Man I Love to her husband, who was looking on from off-stage.

"This was one of the first jazz songs I learned and recorded," she said. "This song is the purest form of love, and I dedicate this song to my husband, who is the man I love, who I waited for, for so many years. Someone who could truly get me, get the jazz thing. I finally found him, and we got married two years ago."

After her flawless performance at the Zappa Club, Milman sang the following evening at the Hebrew U convocation ceremony at the historic Rothberg Amphitheatre – which predates the State of Israel – overlooking the breathtaking Judean desert.

She sang Eli Eli and a Hebrew translation of What a Wonderful World, but it was the opportunity to sing Hatikvah that gave her goosebumps.

Having sung the Israeli national anthem countless times at Jewish events throughout Canada, "it was nothing like singing Hatikvah on Mount Scopus, singing to people who felt it, who know it. I was shivering as people sang along," she said.

Although Milman's parents didn't travel to Israel with her, they were able to share the moment with her while watching the ceremony that streamed live on the Hebrew U website.

"They were able to watch it from home and they were crying," she said.

"I just can't put it into words... It's overwhelming."

Brott Music Festival features music for all tastes

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Toronto-based mezzo-soprano Lauren Segal will return to Hamilton for the 24th season of the Brott Music Festival.

The festival, under the artistic direction of conductor Boris Brott, features acclaimed guest artists performing everything from classical to rock in 18 events from June 11 to Aug. 18, mostly in the Hamilton and Burlington area.

At last year's festival, Segal sang in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This year, she will twice appear at the McIntyre Theatre Mohawk College in Hamilton.

She performs in Opera Ovations! July 7 at 7:30 p.m., with tenor Ermanno Mauro, soprano Sinead Sugrue and baritone Peter McGillivray.

"Opera Ovations! is an opera gala – a greatest hits from opera," Segal says. "I will be singing pieces from The Barber of Seville and Samson and Delilah."

Singing in Samson is somewhat conflicting for the singer, who says her Jewishness plays into everything she does.

"Delilah [is not] a very Jewish-friendly character, and [when you] sing a character, you don't want to disagree with what the character is saying because you are not going to give it, the character, enough credit. So, I think singing a duet about killing Samson, who is this hero, is a little tricky," she says.

"I know you have to push the acting glove, but within my own Jewishness, I am having to find some peace with it and to realize it is this biblical story and that she is one of the characters and has to be played."

Segal will take the stage again Saturday, Aug. 6, at 7:30 p.m. in Carmen in Concert, a staged concert version of the opera, in which she will sing the title role. Also performing are tenor Keith Klassen as José, baritone Gregory Dahl as the toreador Escamillo and soprano Sinead Sugrue as Micaëla, with direction by Giandomenico Vaccari of Italy.

"Carmen will be semi-staged, so we will be having some stage action going on. It will be enough to show the drama, but even if we just stood there, the music is so amazing that the drama would come out," says Segal, who understudied Carmen in Canadian Opera Company's full-stage production of the Bizet opera.

Segal says both productions she is in are filled with passion and excitement.

"I think everyone goes to one of these shows with their own experiences. It might remind them of something else, or take them away from something so that they can have a little break, or make them feel something that they never knew they felt. I want people to enjoy it. I want Toronto audience members to know that the drive to Hamilton is not so far and very much worth it."

Lauren Segal

The singer studied music privately while studying for a master of science degree in the physics department at the University of Toronto.

The two-time recipient of the Metropolitan Opera National Council Auditions Encouragement Award was the only Canadian to participate in the inaugural Salzburg Festival Young Artist Project in 2008.

Earlier this year, Segal performed as Maddalena in Opéra de Montréal's Rigoletto. Her season continued with concert performances with Orchestra Toronto, the Vancouver Bach Choir and the Windsor Symphony, and a Gala Opera Evening performance for the Manitoba Opera. Segal will return to the Canadian Opera Company for productions of Die Zauberflöte, Nixon in China and Ariadne auf Naxos.

Segal also recently appeared in a trilogy of short films, The Trilogy of Desire, inspired by arias from Le Nozze di Figaro, Carmen and Vivaldi's Bajazet.

Segal's website is www.laurensegal.com. For tickets or information on the Brott Music Festival, go to www.brottmusic.com or call 1-888-475-9377, or 905-525-SONG (7664).

Hamlisch headlines star-studded concert

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Composer Marvin Hamlisch will present a star-studded concert, "The Very, Very Best of Broadway" at the Black Creek Summer Music Festival at Rexall Centre at York University next month.

As artistic adviser for the July 9 event, Hamlisch recruited Broadway-musical veterans Audra McDonald and Brian Stokes Mitchell (both were in Toronto for Ragtime in 1996), actor Jane Krakowski, comedian Martin Short and actor Raul Esparza to sing selections from Broadway musicals. Hamlisch will conduct the Black Creek Festival Orchestra and Chorus and play piano.

"The best way to showcase the Black Creek Festival was to select the brightest stars we could find for a concert that nobody would ever forget, from the Broadway musicals," said Hamlisch, 67, in a phone interview. "Having just one or two singers would not guarantee a sell-out audience, but having five established Broadway stars would make the concert an unforgettable experience under the open air and the stars."

Marvin Hamlisch

Hamlisch is known for writing the music for A Chorus Line – Broadway's fourth-longest running show – and They're Playing Our Song, as well as writing scores and songs for 40 films, among them, The Way We Were and Through the Eyes Of Love.

Along with composer Richard Rodgers, Hamlisch is the only other person to have won a Grammy (four times), an Oscar (three times), an Emmy (twice), a Tony and a Pulitzer Prize.

Less well-known is the fact that Hamlisch's Jewish upbringing inspired much of his work and his dedication to doing fundraisers for synagogues and Jewish organizations.

His parents, Austrians Lily and Max, escaped Nazism in 1935. Max jumped from a train headed to Germany, and Lily hid under a car while fleeing to Switzerland before immigrating to America.

"To my mother especially, being Jewish is sacred. She instilled my pride in being Jewish by how she lived. When the Gestapo in Vienna hauled her in for questioning, she secretly kept her Jewish star around her neck under her blouse. Despite my father's pleas that wearing a Jewish star in public was too dangerous, she never took it off her neck. She was a street fighter but always humble in her Jewishness."

Through the years, Hamlisch has done memorable fundraisers for synagogues in Toronto. In May, Hamlisch was honoured at the Cantors Assembly in Toronto during Jewish Music Week.

"I wrote music for the Jewish prayer Shehechiyanu to celebrate the week and was honoured by the cantors," he said. "It was very moving, and I always want to do as much as I can to keep music alive in synagogues."

Hamlisch has performed his original song, Chanukah Lights, to rave reviews at holiday concerts, recorded Hativkah on CD and conducted three cantors singing Oseh Shalom and other Jewish songs in a Calgary concert that has been televised.

Born and raised in New York, Hamlisch is regarded in musical circles as a genius. He was the youngest student ever at age seven to be accepted to the prestigious music school, Juilliard. By his mid-teens, Hamlisch became widely known for his piano playing, and by age 21, he started writing hit songs.

Following his string of writing popular songs for film and Broadway, Hamlisch was the music director for Barbra Streisand's concert tours in the 1990s. He's spent most of his time since 2000 as the pops conductor for the National Symphony Orchestra (U.S.), and the Milwaukee, Pittsburgh and San Diego pops orchestras.

Hamlisch conducts the Black Creek Festival Orchestra and Chorus, joined by five Broadway singers, July 9 at 8 p.m., at Rexall Centre at York U. For tickets, call 888-860-7858 or go to www.blackcreekfestival.com.

Dragon Boats to race on Sea of Galilee

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Its proponents claim that once you try dragon boat racing, you're hooked, but good. Being part of a dragon boat crew builds teamwork, it makes you fit, it raises money for charity and it allows you to see the world.

Although dragon boat racing takes place in 70 countries, it's never before been held in Israel, but that will change next spring when dragon boating will make its official debut on the Sea of Galilee. On May 17 and 18, 2012, as many as 40 boats containing 20 rowers each will compete in the first annual Dragon Boat Israel competition.

Details of the event were unveiled last week at Sunnyside Pavilion overlooking the much chillier and damp shore of Lake Ontario.

Israel's historic freshwater lake, also known as the Kinneret, has never seen the likes of it before: long shallow boats that resemble elongated canoes, a dragon's head at the bow, 20 people pulling in unison, a steerperson at the tiller and a drummer sounding out a relentless beat to encourage the rowers.

Dragon boat racing is a popular sport in North America and it's all the rage in China, where it possesses something like the cultural significance of hockey in Canada.

Debbie Halton-Weiss is chairing the effort to bring Canadian dragon boat racers to Israel to compete with Israeli rowers next year.

Halton-Weiss is hoping as many as 20 teams of 20 rowers each, along with an equal number of spouses and family members, make the trip to Israel next spring. Dragon Boat Israel is recruiting teams and individual rowers from across Canada and has representatives in Calgary, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto and eastern Canada. Montreal should soon have a representative as well, she said.

Sponsors of the event include Israel's Ministry of Tourism, UIA Federations Canada and Marlin Travel. El Al is the event's official airline. Halton-Weiss, who serves as chair of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, said "we see this as a way of federations [thinking] outside the box. It's an amazing outreach program" that gets Jews who might not otherwise be affiliated "to think about community involvement."

Two years ago she had never even seen a dragon boat race, she said. But Ottawa Jewish leaders were asked to participate in a local event and since doing so, she has not looked back.

"I was amazed at the diversity of the rowers, from cancer survivors, to entire offices of co-workers, religious, not religious, young, not so young," she said.

"It's about team-building, synchronicity and working together."

A member of a Jewish team of rowers – the Sea Lions, who all wear No. 18 – Halton-Weiss has been paddling in dragon boat races ever since. Bringing the sport to Israel "combines two passions, Israel and dragon boats," she said.

Frances Halperin is planning to make the trip to Israel and she's getting the word out to friends she races with, as well as others who are recreational paddlers. So far, she's contacted 68 women's teams across the continent, including Team Transplant, a group of cancer survivors.

Halperin has been paddling for 10 years as part of the Dragon's Abreast and Canadians Abreast teams. The teams consist of breast cancer survivors and so far, she said, about 30 racers have committed to make the trip to Israel with her. She expects ultimately to fill two boats.

Most of the rowers are not Jewish. The most common question she hears when she pitches the trip is, "Is it safe?"

"I tell them I spent 2-1/2 weeks touring Israel alone in October, and I never felt it was unsafe," she said.

Halperin, who's travelled to Australia and New Zealand for dragon boat events, is excited about getting back to Israel.

"What's not to love?" she asked. "It's incredible, just incredible. I loved every minute of it."

Doreen Davenport is one of the rowers considering making the trip to Israel. She's already been to dragon boat competitions in Shanghai, Singapore and Cape Town and she's intrigued about "the experience of competing in a new environment and then travelling in a place I've never been."

Davenport is the kind of traveller Oded Grofman is hoping to entice. Grofman, head of the Israel Government Tourism Office's Toronto branch, said Israel is trying to attract visitors who don't necessarily fit the mould of religious pilgrims or those interested in antiquity.

A dragon boat leaves the dock at Sunnyside Pavilion.

"We want to bring different kinds of tourists, to [change Israel's] image and its brand."

More than 75,000 Canadians are expected to visit this year, and sport is increasingly an attraction to them, particularly those looking to hike in the country's historic trails.

Sports tourism "is a niche market, but a significant market for the Israeli government," he said.

The event is being marketed with the slogan, "come for the race – stay for the journey."

Victor Yagoda believes the dragon boat event could prove an important boost to the northern Israeli economy. Yagoda, who serves as project manager for Dragon Boat Israel and is organizing the event on the Israeli side, was impressed with a competition he witnessed in Ottawa that attracted 195 teams.

"It's the kind of event that brings people together... One thing I've learned is that dragon boating is mishpachah [family]."

Yagoda said he expects 20 Israeli teams will compete in the event, matching the Canadian contingent.

However, he acknowledges he has something of an uphill battle, just to raise awareness of the sport. "If you ask an Israeli what is dragon boating, [it's] one of the few times an Israeli will say, 'I don't know,'" he quipped.

Angela Biene, general manager of Marlin Travel in Ottawa, said the travel agency is offering seven- and 10-day packages in three-, four- and five-star hotels, starting at $2,599.

Proposed circumcision ban not merely a parochial concern

Basil Herring and Joel Finkelstein
JTA

Comment

Circumcision, or brit milah, has long been the stuff of cheap jokes and comedy. But in recent weeks, what used to be nothing more than harmless fare has taken on a much more serious tone. So-called "intactivists" on the fringe left of American politics have pushed the radical notion that infant circumcision is an act of genital mutilation, so unacceptable in fact that it ought to be illegal.

That such a notion should have garnered enough signatures to have qualified for a popular referendum in San Francisco (and potentially elsewhere) is deeply troubling. For even if, as expected, it will be defeated in the end – like most such California ballots – that will offer scant comfort to the millions of Americans, Jewish or otherwise, who for good reasons circumcise their sons at birth. For to them – to us – it defies comprehension that in this land of liberty and justice for all, serious consideration can be given to outlawing the fundamental practice of Jews since the beginning of Jewish history.

We thought we had left such things far behind in our long journey through eras and lands of religious bigotry and cultural intolerance.

Proponents of the ballot argue that there is a state interest in opposing the consequences of circumcision. But to carry any weight, only state interests of the highest order and greatest clarity should be permitted to override religious liberty claims. And given the substantial medical evidence that circumcision has positive benefits, that standard cannot be met here.

The referendum has been couched as a vote on male genital mutilation. To frame our age-old practice as genital mutilation is manipulative and misleading, as it precludes any other interpretation of circumcision. To portray the issue, as the intactivists have, via a supposedly humorous cartoon featuring Foreskin Man battling Monster Mohel is worse than a bad joke. It is deeply offensive and beyond the pale of civilized discourse.

The concern, however, goes far beyond the right to circumcise Jewish or Muslim children.

Far more troubling and ominous is what would appear to be a gathering assault on the religious freedoms enjoyed by faith minorities in the United States that so proudly celebrates the separation of church and state.

There are many examples: there are growing efforts to forbid adherence by Muslims to their sharia law. Some hospitals and medical-care facilities have adopted end-of-life policies that would violate the deeply held principles of minority faiths relating to life and death. Some corporate employment policies do not allow for "conscience clause exemptions" based on religious belief. There are ongoing challenges to accommodation of religious practices such as Sabbath eruv construction.

The list goes on.

Such crucial concerns should not be seen as merely the parochial concerns of some Jews. To the contrary, like the First Amendment that so critically ensures every citizen's right to free exercise of religion, they reflect the long tradition of recognizing that the price of liberty, as U.S. president Andrew Jackson said, is eternal vigilance. As long as the practices of any minority faith are threatened, we are all of us – religious or non-religious – at peril of the loss of our fragile freedoms in a world of increasing homogeneity and conformity.

And thus, to ignore or downplay the significance of anti-circumcision activist groups that would presume to oppose others' faith or practices, no matter how frivolous or outlandish it might appear, would be not just folly but a clear and present danger to all of our freedoms. And thus the time to oppose them, in concert with all freedom-loving Americans, is now.

Rabbi Basil Herring is the executive vice-president and Rabbi Joel Finkelstein is vice-president of the Rabbinical Council of America, a modern Orthodox association.

Dutch lawmakers offer compromise on kosher slaughter

JTA

AMSTERDAM — The Dutch parliament has offered a compromise on a bill that would ban kosher slaughter.

Under the compromise hammered out last week, ritual slaughter will not be included in a bill that would ban the slaughter of animals in the Netherlands without first stunning them, if it can be proved that the ritual method of slaughter does not cause additional suffering.

Under the laws of shchitah, or Jewish ritual slaughter, animals may not be rendered unconscious before slaughter. Muslim law has a similar proscription.

The compromise means that the Jewish and Muslim communities can "go and investigate what is possible instead of just telling them what they can't do," lawmaker Stientje van Veldhoven of the centrist D66 party said.

The Jewish community has rejected this line of reasoning, saying the ban and the new amendment demonstrate a lack of religious freedom for Dutch Jews. As many as 50,000 Jews and approximately one million Muslims are living in the Netherlands, according to reports.

The Dutch parliament will vote on the proposed ban, with the amendment, next week.

Shchitah is permissible under European law and to ban it goes against the European Union's Charter of Fundamental Rights, which clearly states that there is freedom of religious practice.

A controversial ban on kosher slaughter put in place by New Zealand's agriculture minister was partially reversed last November amid allegations that the decision was taken to appease Muslim countries that have lucrative trade relations with New Zealand. The ban on kosher slaughter of poultry was suspended, the ban on beef remains.

Kicking off the summer Ashkenaz-style

Daniel Koren
Special to The CJN

It's been 16 years since the Toronto-based Ashkenaz Foundation hosted its first Jewish festival. It is now the largest Jewish event in Canada, showcasing more than 200 artists involved in music, literature and film, with an average attendance of 50,000.

With a distinct focus on the arts, the community-based non-profit organization is relentlessly dedicated to promoting awareness of Jewish and Yiddish cultural happenings.

Though the biennial Ashkenaz Festival took place last year, it did not stop the foundation from throwing a 2011 summer kickoff party on June 16 at Revival Bar in Toronto, as part of its Youth Outreach Program. On the bill were two very different headliners.

Yiddish Princess is a band out of Brooklyn, N.Y., that combines 1980s glam rock/power pop – think Talking Heads or David Bowie – with traditional Yiddish folk music, sung vivaciously by frontwoman Sarah Gordon. With intensity and enthusiasm, Gordon has founded a sound like no other, one that simultaneously evokes nostalgia for the '80s and for the classic Yiddish folklore we grew up on.

The Barons of Tang is a seven-piece ensemble from Australia that has been hailed as one of the leaders of the contemporary "deathcore" movement. Combining Gypsy punk, hard rock, metal and klezmer music, Barons of Tang sounds like an aggressive Gogol Bordello, on steroids.

Together, these two bands provided the audience with a thoroughly enjoyable evening. Each band played its own unique set of musical styles and influences, but with a common fondness for Jewish music.

The night began with a pre-concert shmooze, giving attendees the opportunity to meet the artists, learn about the Ashkenaz initiative, and find out how they could get involved.

Festival co-ordinator Eric Stein, who received a warm shout-out from Gordon toward the end of her band's set, eagerly met and shook hands with people who came out to the event, readily supplying information about the bands and explaining why the bands are perfect representatives for appealing to a youthful Jewish demographic.

"Bands like Yiddish Princess and Barons of Tang draw on many traditional influences but create a sound that is more akin to rock, pop, punk and metal music than the traditional styles that older generations of Jewish music fans might be attracted to," Stein said. "It's music geared to clubs and bars, as opposed to concert halls and synagogues."

It was easy to tell that most people were expecting more traditional sounding music for a Jewish event, and were a bit shocked when Yiddish Princess took the stage. The band played traditional Yiddish folk melodies about Passover and Hanukah, but completely rejuvenated them, adding electricity and a full-on rock esthetic that is seldom heard complimenting Yiddish folk.

"My mom is a Yiddish singer, so I grew up on that kind of music, but also grew up on the '80s, so it seemed like the right thing to do [to merge the two]. No one really does it, but there's lots of room for innovation, so why not?" Gordon asked.

"The thing we like so much about doing this project is that, while it is a Jewish project, it's not exclusive in any way. We all have a really wide range of experiences with Judaism, but it's really important for everybody to be able to express their culture without feeling obligated to being a certain way."

This was not the first time Yiddish Princess was invited to play for an Ashkenaz event. The group performed at last year's festival to a large and enthusiastic crowd. "It was probably one of the best gigs we've ever played, so we are very excited to be back here in Toronto," she said.

For their first-ever performance in Toronto, the Barons of Tang were equally entertaining. With seven musicians, and instruments that included an accordion, saxophone, two different drum kits and a cello, they performed a diverse catalogue of cultural music, including power waltzes, folk ballads and traditional Gypsy songs.

Sporting dreads, mohawks and an overall "punk" attire, the band is absolutely the last image one would conjure when thinking about Jewish music. It is their relationship to klezmer and the way they interpreted it for their songs that made this seemingly hardcore rock band a perfect fit for the Ashkenaz Summer Kickoff.

As an organization that is sponsored by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and government sponsors, among others, as well as private donors, Ashkenaz put together this younger, adult-themed event to remind this demographic about the importance of supporting their local Jewish community. "The future of Toronto's Jewish community in many respects depends on cultivating the next generation of philanthropists who support Jewish causes," said Stein.

It is up to us to provide the next generation with a bright future – one that includes an understanding of our heritage, and an awareness of good music and the arts.

nina.shenhav@gmail.com

הסתובבתי לי באירוע חברתי בשכונה הצפונית שלי, לוגמת לי מיץ טבעי וזוללת מכל הבא לפה, והנה ניגשת אלי דמות מוכרת בקהילה. אנחנו משוחחות לנו, ואז היא שואלת אותי מה דעתי על אדם מסויים.

SPINACH SALAD W PEARS, CRANBERRIES, RED ONION, TOASTED HAZELNUTS

Dressing:
1/2 c olive oil
2 tbls balsamic vinegar
2 tsps whole-grain mustard
1 tsp sugar
1 tsp kosher or sea salt
Freshly ground pepper

In food processor, combine olive oil, vinegar, mustard, sugar, salt, pepper to taste. Process to blend. Taste and adjust seasoning. Set aside.

Salad:
1 c thinly sliced red onion
1/3 c dried cranberries
8 c lightly packed fresh baby spinach leaves
2 firm, ripe pears (do not peel), quartered lengthwise, cored, cut into long, thin slices
2/3 c shelled hazelnuts or unsalted cashews toasted, chopped

Place onions in medium bowl and cover with cold water. Let stand 30 min. (this crisps onion and takes away raw onion taste). Drain well, pat dry on paper towels. In small bowl, toss cranberries with 2 tblsp dressing to soften. Set aside at least 20 min or until ready to serve salad. To assemble salad, place spinach, onions, pears in large bowl. Shake remaining dressing, pour over salad. Toss to coat evenly. Arrange salad in large serving bowl. Scatter cranberries and hazelnuts over top. Serve immediately.

Mom on the road

Married with Children

Lauren Aginsky

"I can't believe you're leaving again." My husband is watching me pack my bags with a look of despondency on his face as he anticipates the long weekend ahead of him, single-parenting four children. He's a modern man, fully in favour of his wife having a career. It's when that career takes her away from home that the situation gets problematic.

The Voice inside me begins its familiar tirade of relentless questioning. "What kind of mother leaves her children? Is this trip really so important? Are you sure you have your priorities straight? Look at these children! How can you leave them?"

My father's judgments don't help either. He reminds me of my late friend Andrea, who died at the age of seven when she suffered a major asthma attack brought on by anxiety. The source of anxiety was the absence of her parents, who were travelling overseas at the time. They came back to a funeral, and a life forever changed.

The reminder is terrifying, prompting a knee-jerk reaction to cancel everything, stay home and guard the door. It's every parent's greatest fear that something terrible will befall their children. But we have to balance that fear with reason, logic and practicality. Will a three-night trip cause irrevocable harm to the children? Probably not. Will they be safe and well cared for in my absence? Yes. Okay. I attempt to banish my Jewish guilt and keep packing.

But in the hours before my flight leaves, my efforts to answer The Voice and its insinuations of parental neglect sound more feeble with each passing minute. "My work makes me feel good," I tell The Voice. "I feel competent at what I do, and I want to keep doing it." Moreover, I'm teaching my kids that it's okay for a mom to work and still be a good mom. That means when they become mothers, they'll know they have choices.

Still, the choices aren't always easy ones, and judgments abound from every direction. With my work as a travel writer I get itineraries jam-packed with interesting people, beautiful hotels and fun destinations. "That's not work," my friends say. "And it's hardly lucrative," my husband reminds me later, as we climb into bed.

I agree, travel writing has its perks, but nevertheless, it is work. There's pressure to deliver great stories, even when the destination is not as perky as its brochures would have you believe. There's solitary meals in the company of my laptop and lonely nights in hotel rooms with the phone clutched to my ear, wishing I could teleport back home and kiss the kids good night. I love my work, don't get me wrong. But it doesn't feel much like a vacation.

He's right about the money. Though it's repeatedly voted one of the best careers in the world, travel writing is not a good way to pay the bills. But money cannot be the exclusive reason to pursue something you love. My work brings me profound satisfaction, and each time I do it I feel a surge of passion, exhilaration and excitement. I return home with renewed energy and a different appreciation for my family and home life.

So I continue to answer The Voice, mustering all my determination. I hoist a backpack on my shoulders, kiss the family goodbye and board another plane. When I get home, I know everyone will be glad to see me. And I'll be a happier mom for following my heart to a career I truly love.

Israel agrees to flotilla compromise

Amira Hass and Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel has agreed to the Greek government's offer Sunday to send the flotilla's humanitarian aid to Gaza with Greek diplomats, under UN supervision. The offer is intended to serve as a compromise in order to end the flotilla affair.

According to a separate report, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas also expressed support for the Greek government's offer.

According to the Greek initiative, the humanitarian aid aboard flotilla ships will be loaded onto Greek government watercraft and transferred to Gaza via the organized channels, as requested by UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon two weeks ago. This means the aid would go through either the Ashdod port or Arish, and from there be taken to the Gaza Strip under the supervision of Greek and UN authorities.

The Greek government has already approached the United Nations and Israel to assess the possibility of transferring the humanitarian aid via Israel or Egypt to the Gaza Strip using Greek ships, under UN supervision.

"The initiative is likely to give everyone a way out, including the flotilla organizers, and allow everyone to feel as though they got part of what they wanted," said a source from the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem.

Greece to transport humanitarian aid

The Greek Foreign Ministry issued a statement on Sunday afternoon that "certain groups of Greek and foreign citizens, without having received the necessary permission required according to the rules of safety, insisted on going through with the enterprise." These people, the Greek Foreign Ministry said, were attempting to break the Gaza blockade, despite the secretary general's request.

The European Union's recommendations were in line with the conclusions of the European Council, the Quartet's (the United Nations, the United States, the EU and Russia) appeal on Saturday and the Greek Foreign Ministry's urging not to participate in the flotilla.

"In light of these developments, and concerned primarily with the protection and safety of human life, the Greek government decided to ban the departure from Greek ports of vessels with Greek or foreign flags bound for Gaza," said the Greek Foreign Ministry, adding that "Greece's stance regarding the need to lift the Gaza blockade and to improve the humanitarian conditions in the area is known and remains unchanged.

"In this critical conjuncture, we should all demonstrate a sense of responsibility or assume entirely and exclusively the responsibility for our actions. The government will act as it must in an orderly fashion and according to the laws of the state," concluded the statement.

Rescued from Entebbe

Thirty-five years ago on July 4, 1976, Israeli soldiers travelled some 4,000 kilometres to rescue more than 100 Israelis who were being held hostage by Palestinian and German terrorists and by the Ugandan army at the Entebbe airport in Uganda. Reporter Yosef Tastassa spoke with Maj.-Gen. Doron Almog, the first Israeli soldier on the runway at Entebbe that fateful night in July. Almog offers his recollections and his insights from the heroic military operation. The young woman in the photo being hugged by family members was one of the hostages rescued. [IGPOP photo]

Standards Review

WINNIPEG — The Sharon Home will undergo a "full standards review" following complaints by family members over the care of elderly residents at the nursing home. The Winnipeg Regional Health Authority (WRHA), in conjunction with the provincial health department, will conduct the review sometime this summer. Concerns over the quality of care surfaced after the death of a resident in November 2009. Following a review, the Sharon Home developed a "long-term action plan" that contained over 39 recommendations for quality improvement, but some residents' families remain dissatisfied with changes at the facility.

WORLD

'Columbo' Dies

LOS ANGELES — Actor Peter Falk, who won four Emmys for playing a rumpled detective on the TV series Columbo, died recently at age 83. He had been suffering from dementia in recent years. Falk played Lt. Frank Columbo on NBC from 1971 to 78, and then reprised the role in several made-for-TV movies. He was born to an eastern European Jewish family in New York in 1927. His right eye was surgically removed after he developed a tumour at the age of three. The glass eye was part of his signature look for the Columbo character, along with his feigned absent-mindedness.

Shchitah Under Fire

SYDNEY, Australia — Australian Jewish leaders have reacted angrily to the growing support for a ban on Jewish ritual slaughter, saying it is motivated by ignorance or antisemitism. Proponents of the ban include animal welfare groups, Greens, independent lawmakers and some Labor backbenchers. Last year, New Zealand tried to follow Switzerland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden in banning shchitah, but the government backed down after the Jewish community launched legal action.

Both Sides Now

NEW YORK — Jewish groups came down on both sides of the New York State government's vote to approve same-sex marriages. The Anti-Defamation League called the Marriage Equality Act "a significant step forward in the pursuit of individual liberty and freedom from discrimination for New Yorkers." The Orthodox Union said in a statement, however, that it was "a mistake" to enact the legislation and that "we oppose the redefinition of marriage and the state sanction of same-sex marriages." The measure, approved June 24, included exemptions for religious groups and other organizations from being forced to acknowledge same-sex marriages.

Freiman Gets Congress Award

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress president Mark Freiman has been awarded the Samuel Bronfman Medal, presented to people who have "rendered distinguished service to Canadian Jewish Congress and to Canada's Jewish community."

A respected lawyer with expertise in constitutional matters, Freiman led Congress through a massive overhaul in which community organizations, including Congress, are being brought within the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA).

In honouring Freiman, Congress vice-president Barbara Bank said he "has acted upon a long-standing dedication to... community... With the winds of change buffeting us with hurricane force, Mark stood fast as our staunch advocate...[reminding] his interlocutors that beyond structures, mandates and boards, real lives and real futures were at stake."

Bank noted that during Freiman's two-year term as president, he defended Canada's anti-hate laws, lobbied for the full implementation of the Security Infrastructure Program, expanded Congress' Darfur advocacy, pushed for a permanent monument to the St. Louis at Pier 21 in Halifax and guided Congress' 90th anniversary celebrations.

Memories and insights from Entebbe

Yosef Tastassa

One of the most heroic and daring military operations in history took place at Entebbe, Uganda, 35 years ago, on July 4, 1976.

The State of Israel decided to send the best of its troops some 4,000 kilometres to bring home more than 100 hostages who had been kidnapped a week earlier on board Air France Flight 139. After the operation, the country felt relief, pride and even amazement at the planning and execution of the rescue mission.

But those feelings were mixed with pain and grief, as Lt.-Col. Yehonatan (Yoni) Netanyahu fell in combat, Surin Hershko was severely wounded and three of the hostages lost their lives during the rescue. Subsequently, we learned that one of the hostages who had been hospitalized before the rescue was dragged from her hospital bed and killed by Ugandan security forces.

Maj.-Gen. Doron Almog

Maj.-Gen. Doron Almog was the commander of Israel's paratroops reconnaissance unit in 1976. He was the first Israeli soldier on the runway at Entebbe. After 34 years of military service, Almog retired from the Israel Defence Forces in 2003. His last post was as the chief of the Southern Command.

Last week, during a visit to Toronto, Almog shared with The CJN some of his memories as well as the insights he gleaned from his mission in Entebbe.

"I was the first soldier to land there, on the ground of Entebbe, charged with the task of marking the route and gaining control of the control tower," he said. "Twenty-five minutes later, Yoni was critically wounded, Surin Hershko was seriously injured and 105 stunned hostages were on their way to the Hercules H-4, together with the soldiers of the Golani Brigade and the airplane's medical team.

"I was the last one to leave Entebbe, just as I received the news that Yoni was no longer among the living. Pieces of memories of our last conversations about an operation we executed deep in Syria in April 1974, when I was the commander of the paratroopers' special tasks force and he joined us from the armoured corps for the special mission, flitted through my mind," Almog said.

Looking back at the Entebbe rescue operation from the vantage point of 35 years later, Almog became philosophical. He reflected about the lessons of Entebbe that can and must be applied today.

"The task of an army leader is not only to fight well, but also to give a sense of confidence and security to those who make decisions," he said. "The State of Israel took upon itself an enormous responsibility when it allowed us to fly there [Uganda], 4,000 kilometres away from our homeland. The confidence of [prime minister Yitzhak] Rabin, [defence minister Shimon] Peres and [IDF chief of staff] Motta Gur came from their belief in our capabilities.

From the editor's desk...

The CJN was in Haifa last month to gain a glimpse of daily life at the very vital and busy Rambam Health Care Campus Hospital that serves some two million people from all parts and places of Israel's north.

The hospital's fealty to the principled dedication to healing and saving human life as practised and taught by Moshe Ben Maimon, known acronymically, respectfully and affectionately as the Rambam, the 12th-century philosopher, scholar and physician after whom the hospital is named, is everywhere on display.

The domain of human knowledge, the Rambam noted in the medical oath he penned, "can extend itself." At the Rambam, it appears that statement is regarded as much prescriptive as descriptive. For the hospital takes the obligation, duty and challenge of extending the domain of human knowledge very seriously.

This was driven home quite forcefully to me when I found myself sitting across the desk one late afternoon from Dr. Joseph Itskovitz-Eldor.

Itskovitz-Eldor is the director of the department of obstetrics and gynecology and of IVF (in vitro fertilization) at the hospital. He has dedicated his entire adult life to helping women or couples who suffer from the inability to conceive. In 1983, he established the first IVF unit at Rambam Medical Center. It was the first of its kind in Israel. Today, the unit is regarded at the top of the field throughout the medical and scientific world.

Itskovitz-Eldor happens also to be one of the world's pivotal, pioneer scientists in the advance of stem-cell research.

Toward the end of the 20th century, he co-developed, in a joint program with colleagues at the medical facility of Technion in Haifa, the very first human stem cell line.

From his laboratory at the Technion, which is affiliated with the Rambam Hospital, he assisted Dr. James Thomson from the University of Wisconsin-Madison to develop the first use of the human stem cell.

Embryonic stem cells can potentially regenerate and repair damages tissue and organs in the body without significant risk of rejection by a patient's immune system.

The physician-scientists at the Rambam Hospital continue to be at the forefront of worldwide stem cell research.

Already 10 years ago, Itskovitz-Eldor and Dr. Lior Gepstein at the Rambam Hospital were the first in the world to use stem cells to form new heart cells and then implant those cells in a damaged heart to repair cardiac dysfunctions in a living organism.

Dr. Karl Skorecki, formerly of Toronto, made aliyah nearly 20 years ago. A nephrologist, he too is pushing forward the frontiers of research and clinical treatment regarding stem cell use as well as in genomic medicine.

He is currently director of the Rappaport Family Institute for Research in the Medical Sciences at the Technion's faculty of medicine and the director of medical and research development at the Rambam Health Care Campus.

His research, as described by the faculty of medicine at the Technion and the Rambam, focuses on the regulation of specific genes, which are restricted in expression to specific differentiated cell types in the kidney, in normal and disease states.

"Now that a particular gene has been located," Skorecki explained, "it is potentially more amenable to targeting and intervention."

Some years ago, a specific line of research conducted by Skorecki made headlines, especially throughout the Jewish world. For he and his team researched provided scientific proof of a clear genetic connection among Kohanim living today around the globe and of their direct lineage from a common ancestor.

"The Kohen study was an introduction to predictive genomics," Skorecki told The CJN.

And it's clearly the quickly burgeoning field of predictive genomics that excites Skorecki. "I can't think of a better time to be doing this research. It allows me to continue to be a student," he enthused.

Moreover and most especially, the implications for the future practice of medicine of the increasingly sophisticated use of genomic markers for disease and cell repair on all aspects of the treatment and prevention of disease are quite revolutionary.

Dr. Joseph Itskovitz-Eldor

Once again, it is no overstatement that the scientists and physicians at Rambam Hospital in Haifa are extending the domain of human knowledge. That they do so for the sake of healing and saving human life makes especially poignant their connection, almost a millennium later, their eternal connection to Moshe ben Maimon, the Rambam himself.

Jewish community marches with Pride

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Jewish community members marched with pride this year at the 2011 Toronto Pride Parade last Sunday.

Some 200 members and supporters of Kulanu Toronto, the city's main Jewish gay and lesbian advocacy organization, walked in the group's contingent at the parade.

This year, the group entered a float, complete with a live band and dancers to celebrate at the parade.

Justine Apple, Kulanu's executive director, said this year's march was one of the most "exciting" she's been involved with.

Controversial anti-Israel group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) mostly honoured their pledge not to participate in this year's event – the group dropped a 40-foot banner off the Wellesley subway station calling for a tourism boycott of Israel – and the parade marched on without incident.

A day earlier, at Pride's Dyke March, a group calling itself Dykes and Trans People for Palestine was spotted carrying signs reading "Israeli Apartheid," according to the Toronto Star.

Toronto city councillor Giorgio Mammoliti allegedly caught the group on film. He told the Star he planned to ask city council to withhold city funding from Pride Toronto because of the signs.

Earlier this year, Toronto city council decided to make the city's nearly $130,000 in grants to Pride conditional upon determining that QuAIA had not participated in the Pride parade.

'We always need the spirit of Entebbe'

"During our conversations and briefings before the operation, they expressed their faith in us – their young soldiers," Almog said. "Giving over this feeling of confidence to those who make decisions at the top national level is a vital component of our real strength."

Almog tied his Entebbe experience to his work today on behalf of the Aleh Negev-Nahalat Rehabilitative Village for disabled children and young adults with severe cognitive disabilities. "We flew to Entebbe with a single goal – to save the hostages," he said. "The Entebbe operation was an expression of our deepest values – that of commitment toward others which we were taught from our earliest age…

"That same commitment brought us to Entebbe and that same spirit must guide our behaviour toward the most vulnerable members of society, the hostages, so to speak, around us today," Almog continued.

"The Entebbe operation entered the pantheon of military history as one of the most daring operations ever undertaken. But for the weakest members of society, those who cannot even ask for themselves, who were deprived from birth, or as a result of an accident or serious illness, of their abilities are held hostage by their condition. We need not fly 4,000 kilometres on their behalf."

Lt.-Col. Yehonatan (Yoni) Netanyahu fell in combat.

Almog said what they need is "a series of courageous social changes brought about through educational programs and exemplary education on the part of individuals and groups, through new regulations and progressive legislation, and by creating a spirit of volunteerism and activity on behalf of the most vulnerable among us."

He added that the "strength of a society is measured by its weakest link. In order to be an exemplary society, we need a sequence of social 'Entebbe operations.'"

Almog said the public good relies on a few self-sacrificing individuals. "This has always been the reality. It will probably remain so. We will always need the spirit of Entebbe – the spirit of determination, of willingness to do for others and not only for ourselves.

"We will always need the 'Nachshons' [a reference to Nachshon ben Aminadav, who was the first to enter the roiling waters of the Red Sea during the Exodus], who leapt forward in front of the rest of the camp. In Israel there will always be a core group who act courageously on behalf of the entire public.

"I pray that this small handful, the torchbearers who go forth at the front of the camp, will bring along with them many more for whom the metaphor of Entebbe serves as a way of life."

Jewish MPs gather in Jerusalem

JTA

More than 50 Jewish lawmakers from 22 countries last week discussed the political challenges of supporting Israel.

The lawmakers were in Israel for the Consultation of the International Council of Jewish Parliamentarians (ICJP), organized by the World Jewish Congress.

Among them were two Canadian members of Parliament – Conservative MP Mark Adler and Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

Addressing his colleagues at the ICJP, Adler voiced Canada's support for Israel.

He said Canada "stands ready" to assist both Israelis and Palestinians in finding helpful ways to reach a negotiated peace settlement in the region. He added: "Canada recognizes Israel's legitimate security concerns and its right to protect itself and its residents from attacks by Hamas and other terrorist groups, including by preventing the smuggling of weapons."

Cotler, a moderator at the consultation and an expert in international law, told delegates to continue to ask their respective parliaments to maintain pressure on Iran.

According to a June 28 report in the Jerusalem Post, Cotler called for all delegates to recognize the four-pronged threat represented by Iran: the threat of its becoming a nuclear state, its continued incitement to genocide by calling on Israel to be destroyed, its support of terrorists and the massive domestic repression it exercises against its own people.

"We must recognize the danger of state-sanctioned incitement to genocide, a crime prohibited by the [UN] Genocide Convention," Cotler said.

The delegates held a hearing last Tuesday in Israel's Knesset, moderated by ICJP chair, U.S. Congressman Gary Ackerman, during which they discussed the anti-Israel feelings being felt in national capitals around the world.

"The coming months will be ones of unprecedented challenge for all those looking to defend the interests of the Jewish state," Dan Diker, secretary general of the World Jewish Congress, said. "Ensuring that these lawmakers can maximize their influence to support Israel and world Jewry's basic rights will therefore be critical in overcoming the many obstacles that we know lie ahead."

The lawmakers met with their Israeli counterparts in the Knesset and with other public officials and visited the protest tent of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

In related news, Canadian Minister of Public Safety Vic Toews also visited Israel last week and met with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu as part of a broader Middle East trip.

According to the ministry, Toews and Netanyahu discussed "the importance Canada attaches to bilateral public safety co-operation, particularly in the areas of national security, law enforcement, emergency management and critical infrastructure protection."

'No rules about how to express dignity,' rabbi says

'Under Jewish law I am obligated to bury the dead, whether or not they are Jewish'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

When Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, senior rabbi of the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Ontario (JRCC), recently received a call for help from a frantic stranger, he knew he couldn't sit back.

The man told him that his wife, the mother of their two young children, had died, and he needed help both financially and with the funeral arrangements.

"He was born in Russia and had lived in Israel for 17 years, but from talking to him, [I learned] that both he and his wife had Jewish fathers, but non-Jewish mothers who still lived in Russia.

"Even though he knew he wasn't Jewish, he wanted me to conduct the funeral because he said he didn't feel connected to any other community."

The first thing Rabbi Zaltzman did, he said, was to put the man in touch with Toronto social services, to see if he could get help paying for the funeral.

"It turned out that because he owned a home, he was not eligible for help, but his friends got together and raised money.

"I told him that I would certainly conduct the funeral, because under Jewish law I am obligated to bury the dead, whether or not they are Jewish."

The difference, he said, is that the woman would be buried in a non-Jewish cemetery and did not need the prayer of Kaddish or any other Hebrew prayers. "I would conduct a funeral appropriate for a non-Jew.

"I went to the cemetery near Finch and Yonge, and I [presided] over the burial. I also encouraged everyone to participate by shovelling dirt onto her coffin."

This is not the first time this situation has come up, Rabbi Zaltzman said, "and it was not the second or third or fourth, because in the Russian community, many people come here with mixed marriages but feel part of our community."

He only did what was right, he said. "The dead should be treated with dignity, and the family should be comforted. People shouldn't raise their eyebrows. I did what had to be done. When it comes to lifecycle events, things have to be done properly. There are no rules about how to express dignity."

As the spiritual leader of the JRCC, he wants people to know that he is there to help them whenever possible, either from an ethical or a religious point of view. "This man may not be Jewish, but he is a human being with two young children. I'm also trying to get him help finding a job."

Rabbi Zaltzman, 55, who has led the JRCC for 30 years, said he wants people to know they can turn to him for help. "Many of our congregants – there are about 32,000 people or 16,000 families – grew up in orphanages and do not know if they are Jewish or not. One of our responsibilities is to help them figure it out. Then we introduce them to Jewish values, and help them embrace the religion.

"The JRCC sends birthday cards to everyone in our community, whether or not they are Jewish. We don't exclude anyone."

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman

The cause of freedom

The general story of the Entebbe rescue 35 years ago on July 4, 1976, is well documented. Some 100 individuals, primarily Israelis, were held hostage by Palestinian and German terrorists and their Ugandan army allies at the Entebbe airport in Uganda. The hostages had been passengers aboard an Air France flight to Paris on June 27. The flight originated in Tel Aviv. Terrorists boarded the flight at a stopover in Athens, commandeered it and then diverted it to Entebbe.

At Entebbe, the terrorists separated the Jewish passengers (the Israelis) from the non-Jewish ones. To their everlasting credit, the captain, Michel Bacos, and his crew chose to stay with the Israelis. Then the countdown to promised massacre and slaughter began.

One week after the terrorists issued their ultimatum to the government of Israel, the Jewish state sent a team of commandos in the quiet dark of night 4,000 kilometres across mostly hostile territory to Entebbe.

The resulting rescue operation will be remembered forever by all freedom-loving nations as principled, bold defiance against brutality and cruel, ruthless hatred. All but four of the hostages were saved. One Israeli soldier, Lt.-Col. Yonatan Netanyahu fell in the action. Another, Surin Hershko, was severely wounded.

Maj.-Gen. Doron Almog, the first Israeli soldier to step onto the tarmac at Entebbe told The CJN in a poignant interview (see page 3) that "the Entebbe operation was an expression of our deepest values – that of commitment toward others which we were taught from our earliest age."

An entire generation has grown up since Entebbe. A great many of that generation are unaware of that heroic episode in Israel's history, just as they are unaware of so much else about the country and the truth of the conflict in which it has been embroiled these past 63 years.

At the UN Security Council, Uganda sought to mobilize its friends to condemn Israel for rescuing its citizens. The motion failed. Israel's ambassador, Chaim Herzog, minced no words in addressing the false, sanctimonious dissimulators of the council. "We are proud not only because we have saved the lives of over a hundred innocent people – men, women and children – but because of the significance of our act for the cause of human freedom."

Alas, the dissimulators, such as the participants and organizers of the Gaza flotilla, persist in their hateful campaign of false accusations against Israel.

And Ambassador Herzog's response is as relevant to them as it was 35 years ago to hostage takers and their allies. Israel stands for the cause of human freedom. The lies and distortions of Israel's enemies merely burnish Israel's truth.

The massacre in Yassi

On June 11 and 12, 1941, the Romanian and German governments signed several accords in Munich and later in Berchtesgaden, Germany. Romania became a devoted ally of Germany and unconditionally supported Hitler's Nazi Germany.

On the eve of Saturday, June 28, 1941, the chilling cry of air sirens could be heard throughout Yassi, Romania. The government claimed it was a "false alarm." Later in the day, however, the sky was set ablaze by rockets, signalling to the public to begin the pogrom against the Jews. The following day, Duminica Aceia, "The Sunday That Was," would unfold as the bloodiest day in the history of Romanian Jewry. Within 24 hours, a proud, creative and culturally rich Jewish community was destroyed. Of the 35,000 Jews who lived in Yassi, an estimated 10,000 to 12,000 were brutally maimed or murdered.

"By the number of its victims, by the bestiality of the means used to torture and kill, by the vast scope of the pillaging and destruction," writes Matatias Carp in his book Cartea Neagra: The Black Book, "the pogrom of Yassi... became the signal, not only to the Romanian Antonescu's government, but also to all fascist Europe, which during the following years, were to kill six million Jewish people."

The Romanian government's policy regarding the Jews was clear and deliberate, as noted by I.C. Butnaru in his book The Silent Holocaust: "Ion Antonescu, Romania's fuhrer, clearly stated [that] 'it makes no difference to me that we'll go down in history as barbarians... There has not existed a more favourable moment in our history. If it is needed, shoot all of them with machine guns." Such are the terrible recollections of the notorious "The Sunday That Was," the day of the Yassi pogrom!

National community leaders in politics (1)

Letter writer Alex Glauberzon, in his attempt to rebut Michael Marmur's defence of Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber's candidacy for the Liberals in the upcoming Ontario election omits important facts that weaken his argument (letters, June 30 and June 10 respectively).

Glauberzon wrongly laments that Farber's run for office taints CJC's non-partisanship because Farber has declared an intention to return to Congress should his bid fail. Glauberzon then commends Michael Mostyn, the Conservative candidate in York Centre, for severing his ties to B'nai Brith before running.

Lost in all this is the fact that Mostyn himself experienced a soft landing after his loss in the 2006 federal election when he was hired by B'nai Brith for its "government relations and diplomatic affairs" portfolio. Following her defeat in Thornhill, former Conservative MPP Tina Molinari served as president of the B'nai Brith Foundation. Josh Cooper, after losing in Thornhill for the federal Conservatives in 2004, served as executive director of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee. Cooper is now with the Jewish National Fund. No one suggests that these Jewish organizations are politically partisan because they employed three former Conservative candidates.

I have served as an officer of CJC and as the Ontario region chair of community relations. My front lawn has had signs from Liberal and Conservative candidates in recent federal and provincial elections, depending on the candidates. As a community, we need to be actively involved in the political system. We should encourage our most passionate advocates for Jewish and social justice concerns, such as Farber, to fully engage at the political level where such leadership is most needed. Who knows how many others like Farber would make fine politicians, if only they could afford to quit their day jobs?

Why does letter writer Alex Glauberzon challenge former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber's decision to seek public office (letters, June 30)? Many candidates who seek office do so with the hope to win, but surely if they lose, they should not be left out in the cold. Lawyers who run for office usually take a leave from their practice and are welcomed back with open arms should they lose. The same is true for academics and others. Why would we not do the same for our own Jewish advocacy professionals who, like Farber, possess exceptional leadership qualities and can potentially make a skilful and ethical politician?

Second 'Freedom Flotilla' politically motivated

Ehud Rosen

The second "Freedom Flotilla" is a joint and co-ordinated effort of several groups working to delegitimize Israel on a global scale. The claim of the organizers that they are seeking to relieve the siege of Gaza and provide urgently needed humanitarian aid rings completely hollow, given the vast economic improvements the territory has been witnessing.

Indeed, the New York Times reported on June 25 that "two luxury hotels are opening in Gaza this month." The report continued with a description of a "second shopping mall" about to open and "hundreds of homes" under construction.

The motivation behind the current flotilla is thus clearly political.

The latest campaign is co-ordinated by Muhammad Sawalha, a senior U.K.-based Muslim Brotherhood figure who, according to Israeli sources, helped establish Hamas' operational infrastructure in the West Bank in the late 1980s. He found asylum in Britain in 1990 and is one of the central leaders of Islamist, anti-Israel and pro-Hamas activities in Britain.

Many of the participating organizations can be directly linked with the Union of Good (UoG), a coalition of European charities affiliated with the Muslim Brotherhood, which in 2008, was designated as a terrorist organization by the U.S. Treasury Department.

Other key organizers of the flotilla are the anti-Israel International Solidarity Movement (ISM), as well as far-left socialists from Europe and the United States. Many of the flotilla's main organizers themselves have stated that the flotilla's prime aim is to create provocation and harm Israel's image.

The first group to send ships to Gaza may have been the ISM, which in August 2008, sent two small Greek-registered fishing boats from Cyprus to Gaza with 44 people on board, calling itself the Free Gaza Movement.

Americans Adam Shapiro and his wife, Huwaida Arraf, founded the ISM in 2001 after the outbreak of the second intifadah. Together with its Palestinian partners, ISM sponsored protests in the West Bank and Gaza, where it was known for welcoming violence and for encouraging its volunteers to compare Israel with the Nazis. In March 2003, a senior member of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad was found hiding in an ISM compound.

Free Gaza Movement members would later join the first flotilla in May 2010 on the Rachel Corrie, sponsored by the Perdana for Global Peace Foundation (previously the Perdana for Global Peace Movement), an organization established by the antisemitic, anti-American former Malaysian prime minister, Mahathir Mohamad.

Other groups and activists usually come from the European and American far-left, such as Paul Larudee, another ISM and Free Gaza co-founder who now heads an American network called the Free Palestine Movement; anarchist, former Israeli Dror Feiler, and Vangelis Pissias from Greece.

However, the more important group in organizing the flotilla is the one affiliated with the Muslim Brotherhood in Europe, and its Palestinian branch, Hamas.

Following Israel's Operation Cast Lead in Gaza, which ended in January 2009, a series of international conferences was held in Turkey to restructure the struggle against Israel. The relationships between Turkey's ruling Justice and Development party, the Muslim Brotherhood and Hamas have been widely documented in the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs monograph Turkey, the Global Muslim Brotherhood, and the Gaza Flotilla. Since 2006, Turkey has become a new centre for the Global Muslim Brotherhood, while the Hamas regime in Gaza acted as the main axis for this activity.

A conference held in February 2009 featured 200 radical Islamist scholars who came to meet with senior Hamas officials to plot a new, "third jihadi front" (in addition to Pakistan and Iraq) centred on Gaza.

Gaza's status became raised as an Islamist symbol for jihad against Israel. The conference gave birth to the infamous, pro-Hamas Istanbul Declaration, which also provided justification for attacking foreign navies that might try to prevent arms smuggling to Gaza.

In March 2009, the first of three Gaza Lifeline/Viva Palestina land convoys arrived in Gaza. It was led by former British member of Parliament George Galloway, under the auspices of a charity he established named Viva Palestina. He joined with others who, according to Israeli sources, are affiliated with Hamas, particularly Zaher Birawi. Two additional land convoys made their way to Gaza in July 2009 and January 2010.

Hamas was the recipient of all vehicles, goods and cash in the first convoy. But the second convoy revealed a deeper connection to the UoG, initiated by Sheikh Yusuf Qaradawi, leader of the Global Muslim Brotherhood. The UoG serves de facto as an important financial arm of Qaradawi's Muslim Brotherhood-affiliated groups around the world.

A much more obvious connection to the UoG can be made with the largest group involved in organizing the Freedom Flotilla – the European Campaign to End the Siege on Gaza.

The Campaign was created in late 2007 and early 2008 as a result of the Palestinians in Europe conferences, an annual gathering that has been taking place since 2003, initiated by the London-based Palestinian Return Centre (PRC), which, in December 2010, was deemed "illegal" by the Israeli defence minister as a "European Hamas affiliate."

Europe is the centre of anti-Israel activity. This poster was displayed in London recently in an anti-Israel rally.

The Campaign to End the Siege on Gaza currently lists an address in Brussels. However, its president, Arafat Shukri (aka Arafat Madi), is also PRC's executive director, and until recently, both PRC and the Campaign also shared the same address and contact details. Furthermore, the Campaign's website (www.savegaza.eu) is registered under Shukri's name and has a PRC e-mail address.

Another founding member of the Campaign is Dutch-based activist Amin Abu Rashed, who took part in the first flotilla and who was described in the Dutch media as the "leader of Hamas in the Netherlands."

Out of 33 NGOs participating in the campaign, almost half are known to have strong connections with the UoG and the Federation of Islamic Organizations in Europe, an umbrella of the Muslim Brotherhood in Europe. The Campaign has also acquired the support of far-left European politicians, groups, and individuals.

The Turkish charity IHH was a very important organizer of the third land convoy, which took place in January 2010. IHH is also a member of the UoG. The third convoy, it must be noted, ended with a violent conflict with Egypt that cost a 21-year-old Egyptian border guard his life. After the complicated, violent week-long fiasco George Galloway was deported and declared persona non grata in Egypt for his role in the affair.

Soon after the violent encounter with Egypt, Muhammad Sawalha, one of the main organizers of the land convoys, revealed his plan in an interview with Hezbollah's Al-Intiqad magazine to send a sea convoy (the May 2010 flotilla), adding, "This time we want to confront the Zionist enemy directly." And indeed, in many Islamist websites, the flotilla was referred to as Gaza Lifeline No. 4.

In general, the same organizers stand behind the second flotilla. However there are several changes.

The most important may be the IHH decision not to send the Mavi Marmara, the ship that brought the first flotilla its publicity following violent clashes between IHH activists and the Israel Defence Forces in which nine Turks were killed. Rather than take a leading role, it appears that the IHH will settle this time for sending activists to sail on other ships.

This decision apparently resulted in a reshuffling of the flotilla structure. The Jordanian Muslim Brotherhood is now more closely involved. Its Gaza Lifeline committee, which operates under Jordan's Muslim Brotherhood-controlled professional associations, recently purchased a ship for 560,000 euros. Wael al-Saqa, the head of the committee, said the ship can carry up to 200 people, and the plan is to carry Arab participants in the flotilla.

Sawalha now appears as the flotilla's co-ordinator under his title as vice-chair of the International Campaign to Break the Siege on Gaza, a U.K.-registered group listing Sawalha as its sole director. The campaign is now also the official co-ordinator of the Miles of Smiles land convoys, the third of which recently arrived in Gaza.

Miles of Smiles is another UoG-affiliated operation, mostly identified with Interpal, a major U.K.-based charity and member of the UoG, which was designated as a terrorist organization by the U.S. Treasury Department in 2003 as well.

A further connection may be seen in the British coalition involved in the flotilla, Britain2Gaza, another U.K.-registered group, which has both Sawalha and Hamas-affiliated Zaher Birawi, a convoy and flotilla spokesman, as its directors.

Sawalha signed the Istanbul Declaration of Feb. 13, 2009, which provides important insights into his motivation to take a leading role in the flotillas. Among other points, the declaration states: "The obligation of the Islamic Nation [is] to open the crossings – all crossings, in and out of Palestine – permanently, in order to allow access to all the needs of the Palestinians – money, clothing, food, medicine, weapons and other essentials, so that they are able to live and perform the jihad in the way of Allah Almighty" (emphasis added).

Another prominent figure is German-based Walid Abu al-Shewarib, who was previously hailed for the role he played in helping to organize the first flotilla. An official Europol document, said to be based on German information, describes him as "a Hamas member who is a leading member of the association Islamische Gemeinschaft Deutschland (Islamic Community in Germany), considered to be the headquarters for the Muslim Brotherhood in Germany." He is also managing director of the Islamisches Kultur und Erziehungszentrum Berlin (Center for Islamic Culture and Education), regarded as the point of contact for Hamas in Berlin.

The Islamist, pro-Hamas character of this flotilla is much deeper than that of the first, which was led primarily by the IHH alone.

Ehud Rosen specializes in modern political Islam, focusing on the ideology and history of the Muslim Brotherhood. He is currently a senior researcher at the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs and teaches at Bar-Ilan University. This is an edited version of Rosen's original essay.

Kaddish for Esther Broner

Perhaps because I was commemorating a yahrzeit when I learned that Esther Broner, novelist, professor, Jewish feminist and activist, had passed away, I found myself thinking about her dedication to the recitation of Kaddish during the mourning period for her father. She did so in a climate that did not easily recognize a woman's right and obligation to say Kaddish.

It was not so long ago that women were not generally recognized as mourners in daily synagogue ritual. The first time I said Kaddish for my mother, she had been gone for many years. I had been part of the secret fellowship of children who remained in the sanctuary for the memorial prayer, Yizkor. But although I grew up as a weekly shul-goer with a Jewish education, the thought of reciting Kaddish for her on her yahrzeit never crossed my mind. Much later, when my father passed away, no one thought to ask me – his only child – to recite the Kaddish at his funeral or in synagogue. In my world, girls simply didn't do that.

In graduate school, I became involved in a minyan that embraced an expanded set of ritual and spiritual possibilities for women. Only then did it occur to me to observe yahrzeit by reciting Kaddish. But our minyan was strictly a Shabbat affair, and yahrzeits have an inconvenient way moving around the week. On my mother's yahrzeit, I went to a synagogue in my neighbourhood, arriving early so that I could make certain it would be acceptable for me to recite Kaddish. The service leader assured me it was.

Only men showed up for daily prayer, which met in a small room in the basement with no provisions for a separate space for women. Momentarily stymied, he had an idea. There was a deep storage closet used for sacred books. The door was fitted with a bookcase – think, Anne Frank's annex – and so was quite heavy. He opened the door slightly, and told me to stand behind it, in the closet. I did, and services began.

Into the habit and concentration of prayer, he soon forgot me. There were no other mourners present, and so he passed over the Kaddish. From behind the heavy door, I began my recitation – but it was my first time, and the double weight of memory and Jewish womanhood pressed upon me. My voice was so soft, the door so thick, I couldn't be heard.

I left feeling depleted. I should have been louder, more assertive, pushier, more aggressive. But I hadn't thought of this as an assertion of women's rights, just a time and place to commemorate my mother, who had loved going to shul. I did not return for the next minyan. It was, in fact, years before I picked up my obligation to say Kaddish for my parents.

Esther Broner chose differently. During the year following her father's death, she was determined to say Kaddish for him, although it was unusual for women to do so, especially at minyanim that met daily. She often took a posse of women with her for moral support, and to ensure that her Kaddish would be heard. With wit, verve, and gutsiness, she turned feelings of diminishment on their head. Most famously, at a minyan that seated her behind a shower curtain as a makeshift mechitzah, she wore a shower cap.

Sara R. Horowitz

in Toronto

She was confrontational in a way that I had not been, at least not in that context. You might say, I behaved like a "good girl," while she dared to be cheeky. And what irony – it was the "bad girl" who mourned her beloved dead in the ritual way, and the "good girl" who did not.

So many women have Kaddish stories like mine. Today we are recognized as ritual mourners in most synagogues. Across denominations, daily minyanim make space and acknowledge a woman's Kaddish, whether she sits among men or separate from them, whether her presence counts toward a minyan or does not.

In the retrospective of Jewish history, the invisible tenacity of women kept Jewish ways alive. I'm grateful to them. I'm grateful, too, for feisty women like Esther Broner, no less tenacious, who refused invisibility. They forged for us a way in.

Genuine faith, not blind obedience

This is the text of a part of the second paragraph of the Shema that an observant Jew is expected to recite morning and night. The version below is from the new Koren Siddur, translated and annotated by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks.

"Be careful lest your heart be tempted and you go astray and worship other gods, bowing down to them. Then the Lord's anger will flare against you and He will close the heavens so that there will be no rain. The land will not yield crops, and you will perish swiftly from the good land that the Lord is giving you."

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

I stopped saying these words in my prayers a long time ago, because they state that natural disasters are God's punishment for human misdeeds. Though there are ostensibly pious Jews who defend this stance, I'm not among them. I believe that natural laws are part of God's creation and cannot be subject to ad hoc divine dispositions.

Recent natural catastrophes have been tragic reminders of why we should refuse to say words that are in blatant contradiction of reality as we know it. Many disasters in the last few months come to mind: earthquakes, first in Haiti and more recently in Japan where it was followed by a tsunami; volcanic eruptions in Iceland, Chile and Eritrea; drought and deluge in China; and closer to home, tornados, floods and wildfires in different parts of Canada and the United States.

Zealous defenders of the faith speak of vicarious punishment: the innocent may suffer for the sins of others. The fact that the doctrine is particularly prevalent in Christian theology – God so loved the world that God let God's only son die on the cross for the sins of humanity – doesn't seem to disturb some Jews. In their fervour as self-appointed defenders of God, they seem to turn God into a callous despot and thus compromise Judaism.

Some apply their misguided doctrine also to the Holocaust, even though that was obviously perpetrated by evil humans, not a superhuman power. Yet we still hear "true believers" proclaim that the Shoah came about because of Reform Jews or Zionists or others they disapprove of. Along similar lines, some have even cited rabbinic sources that earthquakes are collective punishment for individual homosexual acts.

Whenever I argue for the need to revise or excise liturgies of the kind cited above, some well-meaning people tell me that tradition must override personal qualms. If it's written, it must be said and obeyed, because those who wrote it knew best. In equally unacceptable contrast, some cynics say that they prefer to read the prayers in Hebrew because, not understanding them, they need not reflect on their meaning.

Traditionalists often ignore the fact that liturgies are human creations. Even if they contain biblical passages, like the Shema, the context of Scripture is often radically different from its use in prayer.

Scripture tells us how the ancients understood the world, usually assuming that everything on earth was decreed in heaven. In prayer, on the other hand, we turn to God with our own insights, perceptions, needs and hopes. Sometimes the same words come to mean different things and sometimes we may have to find different words to express ourselves sincerely because the old texts no longer work. A historic perspective helps us to understand the Bible; existential integrity moves us to recite prayers in words ancient and modern.

Contemporary feminist thinkers have helped me to understand why the old texts don't always reflect my feelings and aspirations. Scripture is framed by the patriarchal view of God as the mighty ruler who uses nature to punish sinners. Many of us today are in search of God as the nurturer who is there to heal and comfort when life and nature overwhelm us.

Instead of asking why God didn't stop the Holocaust it seems more legitimate to learn in humility from those who went to their death and those who survived how they found strength and comfort in God. Similarly, I stand in awe before the many victims of natural disasters who've turned to God not for explanations – knowing that it's for geologists and climatologists to provide them – but for solace in their hour of need. They're our true teachers.

Refusing to obey blindly isn't an act of rebellion but an honourable effort to affirm genuine faith.

Young Jews volunteer, but don't necessarily connect it to Judaism

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, says that his organization has no problem attracting students with little connection to Jewish life to its volunteer programs.

Contrary to what one might expect based on a recent American study, most young Jews do some kind of volunteer service, but few do it through Jewish agencies or connect it to Jewish values.

This is according to a new study on Jewish young adult volunteerism commissioned by Repair the World, an American organization that promotes service as a defining element of Jewish life and learning.

A research study for Hillel of Greater Toronto a few years ago indicated that "moderates," the largest segment of Jewish students, find international travel with Jews from around the world second-highest on the list of appealing activities, second only to trips to Israel. Volunteer or social justice work ranked 15th.

Zac Kaye

Study researchers inferred that programs such as a relief trip to New Orleans following Hurricane Katrina "should be attractive to most Jewish students."

A recent Hillel service program to Latvia and Lithuania attracted 13 students, about half of whom were of Russian-Israeli background, Kaye told The CJN.

He said the program included "a lot of Jewish content," but that the Jewish aspect "probably wasn't uppermost" in the minds of the participants when they signed up.

He also noted that university students have many other options for service programs that aren't under Jewish auspices.

Alana Kayfetz, manager of volunteer initiatives for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Community Connect, which connects young adults to the Jewish community, did a small informal Facebook survey to find out where young Jewish adults volunteer.

Of the half dozen people who responded, about fifty per cent volunteer under Jewish auspices. "These are people who are engaged in the [Jewish] community one way or another," she said.

In Kayfetz' experience – she has a Facebook network of more than 2,200 friends and worked for Hillel for five years before taking on her present job last year – the 50/50 split is typical, she said.

According to the American study, poverty, the environment, education and illiteracy are the areas that draw most young Jewish volunteers, with Israel-related work at the bottom of the list.

The study, titled Volunteering + Values: A Repair the World Report on Jewish Young Adults, was conducted by Brandeis University's Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies and Gerstein/Agne Strategic Communications, and surveyed some 2,000 Jews aged 18 to 35.

Jon Rosenberg, CEO of Repair the World, opined that many young Jews do not volunteer through Jewish organizations because they don't always know about the opportunities, and also because of the misperception that Jewish groups serve narrowly parochial interests.

Fern Chertok of the Cohen Center, the lead researcher on the study, said getting more young Jews to see the connection between their volunteer work and Jewish values is important, particularly for those who are not religiously observant.

"It allows them to see the work as a Jewish act," she said.

The study showed a high correlation between one's level of Jewish education and future volunteer work, as well as how clearly one views his or her service as being in line with Jewish values.

Ruth Messinger, president of the American Jewish World Service, which runs projects in the Third World in which participants also learn about the Jewish values underlying their work, said Jews are interested in Jewish service learning, but the community needs to provide more opportunities. Jewish organizations, she noted, don't ask for volunteers often enough.

The study provided material that Jewish organizations could use to develop more volunteer opportunities that correspond to the actual interests of younger Jews.

"If you can interest more young Jews who want to volunteer with quality programs in the Jewish community," Messinger told JTA, "they'll get a deeper sense of their Jewish identity and will feel further invested in their Jewish community."

UJA Venture Philanthropy Fund offers $300,000 in new funding

Young leaders spearhead launch of SixPoints.ca

By Daniel Horowitz & Suzanne Wintrob

It's one thing to be charitable, but it's another thing to actually get an opportunity to understand community needs and create a meaningful impact.

That's exactly what businessmen Jonathan Bloomberg, Noah Godfrey and Sam Mizrahi are doing. The trio, who are chairing UJA Federation's SixPoints Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund (JVPF), have successfully encouraged their contemporaries to join them in learning about Jewish philanthropy and making an impact on our community.

Started this past winter, SixPoints, which recently saw the launch of its website (SixPoints.ca) featuring its request for proposals, is comprised of some of our community's most visionary and committed young leaders, all of whom have pooled their financial resources and business planning skills to fund and support new and innovative programs that are consistent with Jewish values, especially that of tikkun olam, "repairing the world."

Here's how SixPoints works.

Each SixPoints' member contributes an equal amount and has one vote. The Fund provides a special emphasis on incorporating business principles and ensuring the sustainability of the organizations it funds. Partners in the fund collectively identify, prioritize and fund new initiatives which can benefit from their time, commitment, abilities and insights, as well as help strategize and follow their progress.

Once all the proposals have been submitted - July 28th is the deadline - SixPoints JVPF members evaluate the proposals and select approximately 10 applicants to make in-person presentations. The SixPoints JVPF then selects four to eight applicants with whom several Fund members will undertake an intensive due diligence process. After this stage, the members vote on which proposals will be funded and the amount of each grant.

The Chairs of UJA Federation's SixPoints Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund (l-r) Sam Mizrahi, Jonathan Bloomberg and Noah Godfrey

While UJA continues to look after the Jewish community's needs here, in Israel, and worldwide, SixPoints creates a unique opportunity to raise risk capital to be invested in innovative and compelling projects with the potential to generate a significant social return on investment.

"This is a great opportunity to get Toronto's best and brightest young leaders together to collaborate on something that does good for the world," says Noah, a 34-year-old entrepreneur and father of three. This year's JVPF Chairs have more than industry experience in common. All are in their 30s, all grew up in Toronto and all are committed to the Jewish community.

Jonathan, for example, spent his childhood watching his parents, Lawrence and Frances Bloomberg, immerse themselves in UJA and other philanthropic endeavours. As co-founder of the investment counseling firm BloombergSen Inc., the time felt right to follow his parents' example.

"I'm interested in UJA, I've been around it my whole life," says Jonathan, 37. "This fund made a lot of sense to me because it's a unique, hands-on approach to philanthropy, giving us the chance to have a direct impact and see how we're making a difference."

Jonathan and his Co-Chairs are hard at work recruiting their friends and colleagues. Men and women between ages 30 and 45 are welcome, with each member investing $10,000.

Noah, son of UJA long-time supporters Paul and Gina Godfrey, is particularly excited about being able to get up close and personal with his donation. "The ability to touch and feel the impact, to point to a group of people and say 'their lives are better because we were able to help them' - it just feels good to put a face and a story to your giving," he says.

Sam agrees. The 40-year-old father of two, who came to Canada from Iran in 1977, has spent his entire adult life building companies and now heads Mizrahi Developments. He had wanted to get involved in the Jewish community for quite some time, but couldn't find the right fit. When he heard about JVPF, he was hooked.

"JVPF is a very unique type of structure," says Sam. "It creates an entrepreneurial edge for an organization so they can be self-propelling. It's one of many great visionary UJA projects – how to utilize the resources of donors like myself, Jonathan and Noah to sort of take it up a notch, to let us roll up our sleeves, and get involved first-hand."

Discovering family after 67 years

Laura Fixman
Intern

Anna Zvi didn't expect to find anyone when she was searching in the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem's database for information about her late father's family; so she said it was a shock when she discovered a cousin she didn't know she had.

She had recently received her birth certificate from Hungary and knew the correct spelling of her father's name. Her daughter convinced her to look in the database one more time, and she ended up finding her cousin, Hava Evron, who lives in Israel.

"It was disbelief at first, but now it's a great feeling," Zvi said. "We've gotten very close."

The cousins first met in Israel in August 2010, and they met in Toronto for the first time last month.

"We can get closer in a different setting, and she can meet my family," Zvi said.

Evron wasn't as surprised at finding her cousin, because she knew there was a relative somewhere, but didn't know the details. Zvi said her mother never spoke about the Holocaust or her father's side of the family.

The cousins speak on the phone every week, and Zvi said the best part is expanding her once small family.

"Now I can say I'm visiting my relatives in Israel instead of just my husband's relatives," she said. "I don't know many people who get to experience discovering family like that."

She added that if she hadn't kept looking, she never would have found out about Evron. She said there were many times when their paths could have crossed but didn't.

For example, her son and Evron's granddaughter went to the same camp in the same year. They were also both invited to the wedding of a cousin of Zvi's husband.

No one who's looking for lost relatives should give up, she said. "There is still hope for other people that are looking for family. It still does happen."

The cousins found each other through the Shoah Victims' Names Recovery Project. Yad Vashem in Israel has more than four million names and asks people to submit testimonies of relatives for this global project.

Zvi's father and Evron's mother were brother and sister, although Zvi had thought her father was an only child. Evron's parents moved to Israel in 1939, and although they told her about Zvi, she didn't think they would be able to find each other. Their grandmother, who knew of them both, once stayed with Evron in Israel, but didn't mention that she knew where Zvi was.

From left are Ben and Anna Zvi and Hava and Shraga Evron. Anna and Hava are cousins who recently found each other through the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

Even if people think they have little chance of finding each other, Zvi advises those in the same situation to never give up hope.

"I would tell them to really look, even if the chances are slim," she said. "There are so many coincidences in life, and it's always possible."

After her sister died, Evron was excited to find a relative other than her children and grandchildren. Zvi said that after not knowing each other for so many years, they both felt it was important to make the most of their time together.

Zvi said she was a little nervous before meeting her cousin for the first time, but after a few minutes she felt completely comfortable.

"It was strange at first, but then exhilarating," Zvi said. "It was like we had always known each other since we bonded right away."

Sandy Rabinowitz

AHS principal retiring, but not leaving

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

After 45 years as an educator, Sandy Rabinowitz says he is still fascinated by how children learn and how educators can make it easier for them.

Last week, the 67-year-old native of Johannesburg retired as senior principal of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto (AHS) and general studies principal of the school's Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill. He will continue to work at the school part time as a consultant and mentor.

Rabinowitz said he would have pursued a career in law if his high school Latin teacher hadn't questioned his ambitions. "You mean you're not going to teach?" he recalls her asking.

He began to consider her suggestion, influenced in part by his upcoming nine months of compulsory army service before university. One of the perks of enlisting as a teacher, he said, was free university education, provided he agreed to teach for three years after obtaining his degree.

He thought about applying to law school later, and working on a second degree part time while he was teaching.

"The truth of the matter is," he said, "that once I started teaching, I really enjoyed it."

Rabinowitz studied at Witwatersrand University and began his career teaching English and guidance at a boys' high school in Johannesburg. Before leaving South Africa, he served as vice-principal of Johannesburg's King David High School, and then as principal of the Hillel School about half an hour east of the city, in Benoni.

Rabinowitz, his wife, and their two young daughters came to Toronto in 1978 to join his brother-in-law and leave behind the turbulence of mid-1970s Johannesburg.

Within six months, he was teaching English to newcomers, none of whom had been here as long as he had.

His introduction to AHS came about after his mother died in 1980, and a friend brought him to Rabbi Eliezer Rokeach's nearby shtibl when he was saying Kaddish.

Rabbi Rokeach, then the school's Hebrew principal, told him that Associated was looking for an elementary school principal.

From the beginning, Rabinowitz has had a particular interest in special education. Working with students at the Toronto Learning Centre before he joined Associated, he was struck by the number of "highly intelligent" children who had difficulty in areas including math, reading, and expressing themselves in writing.

"Those were three very formative years for me."

He said one of the things that has impressed him most about Associated, a three-campus school with about 1,650 students, is "its real attempt to be the community school that it is," particularly in its absorption of new immigrants and its commitment to students with learning disabilities.

When the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School – which served students with learning disabilities – closed in 2008, Associated was one of three schools to accommodate its former students.

As well, Rabinowitz said, "Some of my strongest memories are of the years when we were absorbing the Russian population. We had to learn a lot about ESL. I remember families coming with little pieces of paper with our school's name on it, that they got in displacement camps in Italy."

Outside of the school, Rabinowitz served for eight years, from about 1984, as chair of the (then) Board of Jewish Education's committee of day school principals.

By the early 1990s, "everybody" was part of the committee, he noted. It served as a forum for administrators to share expertise and common problems, regardless of denominational affiliation or school philosophy.

U of T historian accepts Oxford job

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A University of Toronto historian has been named Oxford University's first professor of Israeli studies.

Derek Penslar, the Samuel Zacks professor of Jewish history at U of T, will take up his new position in the fall of 2012.

Penslar, a 52-year-old dual American-Canadian citizen, will be the inaugural holder of a chair funded by the Stanley and Zea Lewis Foundation. The late Stanley Lewis, a supporter of Israel, was a British businessman who died two years ago.

"I accepted [the position] because of Oxford's strengths as a centre for graduate training in modern Middle Eastern studies, of which Israel studies can become an integral component, and because of the opportunity to develop Israel studies in Britain and in Europe and foster a wide-ranging and open-minded conversation about Israel within British academia," Penslar said.

Will become famed university's first professor of Israeli studies

Penslar, who headed U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies from 2002 to 2008, will be based in Oxford's School of International Area Studies and in its department of politics and international relations.

He'll deliver lectures and supervise graduate student research on Israeli history, politics, society and economy.

Born in Los Angeles and educated at Stanford University and the University of California at Berkeley, he taught at Indiana University from 1987 to 1998.

Penslar has lived and worked in Toronto for more than a decade.

"I have been extremely happy at U of T and cherish its intellectual vitality and collegiality," he said.

Penslar takes pride in having turned U of T's Jewish studies program into the Centre for Jewish Studies, increasing undergraduate enrolment and establishing a doctoral collaborative program in Jewish studies.

"Under the dynamic leadership of Hindy Najman, who succeeded me as CJS director, Jewish studies at U of T has gone from strength to strength."

In general, Jewish and Israeli studies have both expanded greatly in recent years, he noted.

"When I was a graduate student, the Association for Jewish Studies was in its infancy, and the Association for Israel Studies hadn't even yet been founded," he said. "Few doctoral students wrote dissertations in Jewish history, and fewer still worked on Zionism or Israel."

He added: "Today, most major universities offer courses on Israel, and the more students have an opportunity to learn about Israel in depth, the less likely they will fall into extreme positions fuelled by emotion rather than understanding."

Penslar believes that "a just solution" to the Arab-Israeli conflict should be based on the two-state paradigm. "I don't know if that makes me a dove or a realist, understanding that the current situation is unsustainable and deeply harmful to both sides."

A prolific author, Penslar is currently writing a book on Jews and the military. He plans to finish it by December.

Derek Penslar

In the fall, the University of Wisconsin Press will publish his documentary history of the making of modern Israel. He co-wrote it with Eran Kaplan, a former Ray D. Wolfe Fellow at U of T.

"My next project is a biography of Theodor Herzl – the founder of modern political Zionism – for Yale University Press' new series on the 100 most important figures in Jewish history."

Penslar's previous books include Zionism and Technocracy: The Engineering of Jewish Settlement in Palestine, 1870-1918, Israel in History: The Jewish State in Comparative Perspective and Shylock's Children: Economics and Jewish Identity in Modern Europe.

Led campaign for Yiddish on Lodz ghetto plaques

He and his wife launched and ran Yiddishland Café

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

A Toronto Yiddishist who played a key role in successfully urging city officials in Lodz to include Yiddish on commemorative plaques for the 60th anniversary of the Lodz ghetto liquidation is being remembered as a man of few words whose impact belied his quiet nature.

Norbert (Nochem) Reinhartz died in his sleep June 26 at Humber River Regional Hospital, following a series of serious health challenges dating back to 2005. He was 86.

Together with his wife Henia (a retired Yiddish teacher), Reinhartz, a retired typesetter, led an e-mail campaign that resulted in Yiddish being added to the plaques in Lodz, following a 2003 family trip to Poland.

Their daughter Adele Reinhartz, a professor at the University of Ottawa, recalled in a eulogy that on the trip, her father "was genuinely interested in talking to the Polish people" about issues like the country's transition to democracy.

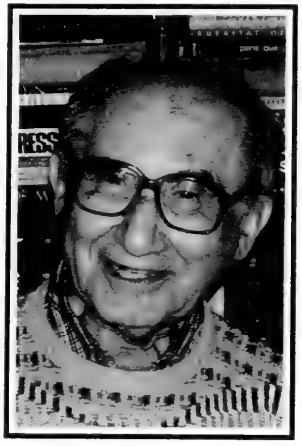
The couple placed a high value on education and intellectual endeavours, she said. After immigrating to Toronto, Reinhartz completed a BA in sociology part-time at York University and a second one in political science from the University of London as a correspondence student.

At the same time, recalled granddaughter Leah Reinhartz, he was "the type of grandfather who would get down on the floor and play with you."

The only child of two teachers, Reinhartz was born in 1924 in Lodz and grew up in Vilna. He spent the war years in Siberia with his father, working in a metal factory.

In postwar Paris, he worked as a typesetter for the Yiddish publication Unser Stimme (Our Voice). It was there that he met Henia at a lecture sponsored by the Bundist movement.

A mischievous impulse to pull on the redhead's long braid led to a vibrant and devoted marriage of 59 years.



Nochem Reinhartz

Nochem joined his parents in Toronto in 1949, and Henia reunited with her mother and sister (the Yiddish poet Chava Rosenfarb) in Montreal about a year later. The couple wed in 1952.

Their son Abe, a Toronto physician, described his parents' dynamic at the funeral: "My mother has always been the public persona of the Henia and Nochem show, but my father was always behind the scenes kind of choreographing things."

Among their other endeavours, the couple translated the memoirs of Arnold Mostowicz, a Lodz ghetto physician, from Polish to English.

As well, they launched and ran the Yiddishland Café, a five-times-yearly event based at the Jewish and Yiddish cultural organization Workmen's Circle from 1996 to 2005. At the time, Reinhartz served as secretary of the organization's executive board.

Reinhartz' grandson Mordechai Walfish remembered his grandfather in a eulogy as "a Bundist, a Yiddishist, a union man, an intellectual but not an academic" who infused everyday life with meaning and revealed his sharp sense of humour selectively.

Abe also noted his father's sense of integrity and social justice, reflected in the program of a Yiddishland Café evening that featured a combination of Jewish and black protest songs.

Reinhartz leaves his wife Henia, daughter Adele and son Abe, six grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

Counting Jews

This is a census year in Canada – with a difference. There was no small amount of controversy when the Conservative government decided to replace the mandatory long-form census with a voluntary survey. Afterward, many leaders – including those in the Jewish community – have urged recipients of the voluntary survey to complete them so that we are properly counted for planning and funding purposes. [http://bit.ly/censjew1]

While leaders are counting on Jews to participate in the census, Jewish tradition has its own views on the counting of Jews – some of it positive, some of it not.

Right now, we (appropriately) are reading each Shabbat from the Book of Numbers, which begins with a census of the Israelites. According to a Midrash, the Jewish people were counted 10 times throughout history from starting with the 70 souls who went down to Egypt. Why all the counting? Chabad.org explains that "God's affection is extended toward the Jewish people at all times. And since counting is a direct result of this affection, Rashi writes, 'Because they are precious to him (which is all the time), He counts them all the time.'" [http://bit.ly/censjew9]

So what's the problem with counting Jews? Rabbi Meir Goldberg puts it succinctly: "If we isolate each Jew by counting them separately, we lose our merit as part of the Jewish collective. Once that happens, each of us is scrutinized as individuals and our flaws are exposed." [http://bit.ly/censjew3]

Even a personality as great as King David is known to have ordered a census – and was punished for doing so. Rabbi Meir Tamari suggests that David's sin was one of vanity. David's commander-in-chief, Yoav, "pointed out to him that there was neither a war nor a national emergency that would justify a census. Simply to know how many soldiers one has, so that one can feel the satisfaction of being a powerful king or to show off military might, is a not merely a misuse of the census but a sin against the role of kingship." [http://bit.ly/censjew4]

Jewish & Digital

The prohibitions against counting are not always clear. Two excellent articles at YoungIsrael.org examine whether the source is biblical, prophetic or rabbinic – or perhaps a concern about attracting the Evil Eye. [http://bit.ly/censjew5] They then grapple with practical issues like how to count participants in a minyan. (Often a 10-word verse is recited, each word corresponding to an individual.) But what do you do when you need to give a head count to a caterer? Or if your government wants to count you? [http://bit.ly/censjew6]

Should Jews allow themselves to be counted in a national census such as the one being held in Canada? After much deliberation, Rabbi Eliezer Valdenberg wrote that it is permitted because:

- it is not a head count;
- the figures are given in writing;
- the people are not being counted in person by those doing the counting, and
- the counting is not for naught or curiosity, but for the needs of the state. [http://bit.ly/censjew7]

So if you haven't already, it's time to complete the mandatory short form census or, if you have been selected, the voluntary National Household Survey. [http://bit.ly/censjew8]

Facebook engages Jews in conversation

I am a moderate user of social media. I check my Facebook feed a few times a day – not as regularly as peers who exhibit withdrawal symptoms after a few hours offline but more frequently than Luddites who only update their status once a week.

Facebook is largely a social platform, a place to catch up with friends, stay up to date on their changing jobs and relationships, and make social plans. I post on friends' walls for their birthdays, scroll through photos, and update my status on what I'm doing and where I'm going.

In December, I began posting a link to my column on cjnews.com on Facebook and Twitter. Within hours my understanding of social media changed.

First, the link was spread. My tweet was "retweeted," and my Facebook posting was "liked" and reposted on other users' walls. Each of these retweets and "likes" opened the article to new networks of friends and new audiences of readers. "Liking" a link not only makes it visible to others, but it is also a positive affirmation urging others to read – if my friend read it, perhaps I should, too.

In seeking to engage young Jews, we rely on the broad reach of Facebook. Any organization working with young people has a Facebook page, sends out invitations for events, and messages potential participants on Facebook. The platform allows us to quickly reach thousands with the click of a mouse.

We also use Facebook to promote issues. There are thousands of Jewish groups on Facebook – groups that promote a love of Israel, commemorate Jewish holidays, or Jewish social justice. Last week, in marking the fifth year of Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit's captivity by Hamas, I posted a status in his name, an act that was likely seen by hundreds.

These uses of Facebook, however, are unidirectional. I post a link and people view it. What surprised me after posting The CJN link was the dialogue that ensued.

Shortly after the link was circulated, a conversation took form. On my and other's Facebook walls, comments and critiques of my article were posted. In contrast to a traditional letter to the editor, the posts were immediate and subject to their own comment. While some agreed and others disagreed with my column, the sense of empowerment to voice an opinion was a demonstration of the democratization of ideas that Facebook facilitates. Young adults are willing to engage in an online conversation in a way that they wouldn't in person. After posting links to subsequent columns, I have engaged in profound online conversations about day school funding, the death of Osama bin Laden, feminism in Judaism, and other topics.

In addition to sharing information by advertising events and promoting causes, Facebook can be a platform for engaging young Jews in deep conversation. It offers a space to ask questions and, more importantly, to listen to responses. While we use Facebook for talking and advertising events and causes, we need to do better at using Facebook as a forum for listening. With regular stories of hackers and predators, we are often wary of Facebook. As with all new media, the blessings and curses come with the manner in which it is used.

Kohn-gratulating the Ashkenaz Foundation

Yiddish has been considered a dying language for years, but it's not going out without a fight. In 1995, the Ashkenaz Foundation was founded with a simple mission, to foster increased awareness of Yiddish and Jewish culture.

The Ashkenaz Foundation is a non-profit organization, and because of this, it relies heavily on a combination of volunteers and interns for staff. The Kohn Summer Intern Program helps to provide the Ashkenaz Foundation with staff.

Stephanie Muskat is one of the Kohn interns. She will work with the Ashkenaz Foundation until September, when she goes back to school to finish her honours life-sciences degree at McMaster University.

For Muskat, this internship is more than just a job. It's a great learning experience that allows her to do something she is passionate about.

"Kohn has given me the opportunity to explore a completely new field within my community. I get hands-on experience working with fantastic and very skilled individuals," she said.

"I love my environment at the Ashkenaz Foundation, as it teaches me exactly how non-profit organizations work overall. I also get an inside view at what goes on behind the scenes in order to set up large-scale events, concerts, etc., in the arts industry. Music and the arts is a huge passion of mine, and I am so thankful to be given this fantastic opportunity."

The Ashkenaz Foundation organizes a lot of events to help promote Yiddish culture, but perhaps the biggest draw is the multi-disciplinary biennual Ashkenaz Festival. Unfortunately, this is an off year, so festival goers will have to wait until next year to enjoy this great event. Despite the absence of the festival, the foundation is presenting other events.

On Campus

The Ashkenaz Foundation recently held a concert with the band Yiddish Princess. This group plays '80s-style rock, with lyrics from classical Yiddish poetry, "It felt like a perfect mixture of my ancestors' culture and my current culture," Muskat said.

She stressed that it's important to fuse Yiddish culture with our current environment in order to make Yiddish culture more relevant for a younger generation. "Yiddish and Jewish music and culture is our ancestral heritage and should not be forgotten. I think it is important to grow and expand off of what was started years ago so that we can keep our traditions alive by creating music and art that feels modern and relevant to the present day," Muskat said.

"There is a whole younger generation that could be learning about their artistic and cultural heritage in an easily accessible, non-religious and apolitical way."

Muskat has worked tirelessly to make sure all the Ashkenaz events she is involved with have been successful. Her work, along with that of many others, helps to preserve our past culture, and is also helping to create a new culture that draws from our past.

Ashkenaz's annual summer Yiddish concert features the Serendipity Quartet, made up of singer Theodore Bikel, pianist Tamara Brooks, accordionist Merima and singer Shura Lipovsky. The concert takes place on Aug. 21 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto. For more information, visit www.ashkenazfestival.com.

Acts of kindness help heal the world

One of my most cherished memories from youth is my parents' love and compassion for every human being.

My father Z"l had unique people skills. He knew how to treat every individual with respect, no matter what his social or financial situation. In the synagogue where I grew up, it was customary to sell Torah honours every Shabbat. My father would frequently buy them for people who hadn't the means, claiming they, too, should have Torah honours if they so desired.

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

A vivid memory comes to mind of one Yom Kippur when the synagogue sexton fell ill and needed emergency attention in the middle of services. My father carried him out and took him to the hospital.

On another occasion, my father was walking in the street and saw someone collapse. My father stopped and took off his new jacket, which he had just bought that day, in order for that person to have a cushion until the ambulance came.

During the last few years of his life, my father underwent dialysis treatment three times a week in the hospital. Even though the treatment was unpleasant and painful at times, my father was able to keep his spirits up by offering encouraging words to other patients and words of appreciation to the nurses and other staff members.

Our home was always filled with people. Very often, these people were destitute with nowhere to go. On other occasions, distinguished rabbis might need a kosher home for a few days.

This was my mother's home where all soon learned of my mother's rare gift as a superb and skilled listener in whom people could – and did! – confide, knowing she would respect privacy and confidences. In short, our home was known to be a welcoming environment where people came for a good meal, a good word and a place of comfort.

I frequently think about my parents and their selflessness and kindness and devotion to other people and ask myself why they were so kind and giving, regularly going out of their way to help others.

I believe my parents understood that, in order for this world to exist with healthy, cohesive communities, we have to help one another. They took this very seriously and personally.

King David sang (Psalms 89:3), "A world of kindness will be built," using the future tense to imply that each of us has to build a world of kindness. Acts of kindness perfect this world, a world in which we may coexist peacefully and productively.

I think of my parents, especially in light of the recent violent events in my city, Vancouver. What my parents exemplified unceasingly in their own lives is what we need to do now to heal our city and, indeed, for a tikkun olam generally – a cascading increase in our acts of lovingkindness toward others. There is no other way.

Let us endeavour to incorporate acts of lovingkindness in our individual lives and communities, as well as in the world at large – even if it is just to facilitate a child's saying Kaddish at a parent's graveside.

Is antisemitism rising in Canada's north?

By Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

The 2001 federal census found all of 15 Jews living in Yellowknife. For the past two years, one of them has appealed for help to combat anti-Israel and antisemitic sentiments that seem to be taking root in the Northwest Territories capital.

Last month, one Jewish organization took action. The Toronto-based Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies wrote "with great unease and dismay" to Dennis Bevington, the NDP MP for the riding of Western Arctic, to discuss "the growing problem of rising antisemitism in Northern Canada."

The centre said it was alerted "by a member of the Yellowknife community who is concerned that antisemitism masked as hatred for Israel is being used to make the dwindling Jewish population of the North feel increasingly marginalized and unwelcome."

The letter cited Bevington's "endorsement" of George Galloway, the fiery pro-Hamas former British MP who spoke in Yellowknife last November as part of a 10-city Canadian tour.

"This strikes us as an outrageous position for a member of Parliament to hold," and one that is "inconsistent with official NDP policy," the centre charged.

Bevington, who introduced Galloway last Nov. 24 before a crowd of about 300, did not return The CJN's calls for comment.

The letter, which said it looked forward to meeting with Bevington, was signed by Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, and Tony Comper, founder of FAST (Fighting Antisemitism Together).

It was copied to federal NDP leader Jack Layton.

Asked to elaborate on the letter and indicate whether it referred to a specific incident, as well as why the Friends were reacting now to Galloway's visit seven months ago, Benlolo told The CJN in an e-mail that "Friends of Simon Wiesenthal has received complaints about increasing anti-Israel, antisemitic activity from Yellowknife. We have been tracking the discourse and are becoming more concerned about this issue.

"We believe it is important that political leaders in Yellowknife know that the rest of Canada is aware of what is taking place in the North and that we are troubled by the rise in antisemitic sentiment. The letter... is an effort to convey our concern and to begin a dialogue which we hope will lead to greater understanding."

In a followup request for clarification, the centre said it "wants to ensure that community leaders in Yellowknife understand that antisemitic activity in the North has not gone unnoticed and we are monitoring the situation closely."

One resident of Yellowknife, who moved there eight years ago from southwestern Ontario and asked to remain anonymous after her views, printed in the local newspaper, were met with a "deluge" of opposition, told The CJN that antisemitic and anti-Zionist sentiment has become noticeable in the city, with little or no counteraction.

"Three years ago, everyone here got along," she said. "Now it's different."

She said problems began in late 2008 with the establishment of Focus on Palestine, a pro-Palestinian group that hosted Galloway's talk at Yellowknife United Church.

She blamed another local group, Alternatives North, which describes itself as a social justice coalition and helped organize Galloway's talk, for fanning anti-Israel sentiment.

The two groups co-hosted a local talk last November by Kevin Neish, a Canadian participant in both the 2010 and 2011 aid flotillas to Gaza, and have staged photo exhibits, films and events that were "horribly one-sided and incorrect," the resident said.

In an earlier appeal sent to The CJN, she said that since the birth of Focus on Palestine, "we no longer feel the sense of community. We are shocked at ignorance about Israel and Jewish history. We are dismayed at how easily and quickly northerners submitted to anti-Israel sentiments and old antisemitic references without examining both sides of the issue, without demanding facts.

Dennis Bevington

George Galloway

"Not a single soul or organization protested that Israel was conspicuously and consistently singled out for condemnation," she added.

She said she fears that later this summer, Focus on Palestine will host its fourth annual "hate-fest" against Israel.

The resident put her concerns in a letter to Yellowknife's mayor, Gordon Van Tighem, who responded to her on June 27.

"While sometimes uncomfortable, most of us enjoy the fact that being in Canada allows for freedom of religion," Van Tighem wrote. "Perhaps the best defence would encourage the use of a good offence, and the small Jewish community could sponsor a couple of informational events celebrating their view on the subject. If one person has created an imbalance, it should only take one person to re-set the balance with another perspective on the topic you have issue with.

"I have not seen much good achieved through confrontation, but friendly persuasion can accomplish miracles," the mayor added.

One Jewish organization advised the resident to find out whether Bevington made anti-Israel statements when he introduced Galloway.

(An online video of the event shows the MP made no anti-Israel or antisemitic remarks, though he did have warm words for Galloway, calling him a "statesperson" and "a person who spoke up... I appreciate someone like that.")

The resident also lamented that "for two years, I've sent out appeal letters to all Jewish organizations and no concrete help has arrived."

Canadian Jewish Congress referred her to the Canada-Israel Committee.

"I can't generalize and say there is a problem in Yellowknife," Judy Zelikovitz, the CIC's national manager of community services, told The CJN.

"I know that [the resident] perceives a problem in Yellowknife... To my knowledge, there has not been any overt attack on any local members of the Jewish community there," Zelikovitz said.

She said she "can't agree" that Focus on Palestine and Alternatives North are problematic "because I don't know enough about the circumstances and situation. I don't like what their raison d'être is but I can't say they're any more problematic because they're there as opposed to in Toronto or Hamilton or somewhere on the East Coast."

But "we certainly are listening to what [the resident] says."

With only a handful of Jews in Yellowknife, "most not identifying themselves and the rest not wanting to cause trouble," the resident wrote one Jewish group in May, "I'm a lone voice and target."

Questions about CBC's impartiality

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In The Battle for History, an essay in the New York Times Book Review of May 29, Adam Kirsch, a senior editor at The New Republic, reviewed a number of recent books on World War II. Kirsch said the writers in question are "less interested in rewriting the facts of the war than in reconsidering their moral implications."

While Kirsch maintained that the authors are not arguing "for a moral equivalence between the Axis and the Allies," it becomes rather evident that some are doing just that.

Kirsch drew attention to the British philosopher A.C. Grayling who, on one level, affirms that World War II was "a just war against morally criminal enemies," but on another, concludes that the bombing of German and Japanese cities were "terrorist attacks," little different "in principle" from the 9/11 atrocities.

While it's true that some of these arguments for moral equivalence (or something more extreme) are nothing new, there's clearly a growing atmosphere in which anti-western righteous indignation trumps moral clarity anchored in basic historical fact.

Given this climate, is it any wonder that, for many, Hamas violence is ignored while Israel's right to self-defence is condemned as a moral crime against Gazans? Again, while this attitude is not new, it is gaining uncritical acceptance in key media circles.

For example, CBC Radio's The Current on June 23 featured American writer Alice Walker explaining from Greece why she's joining the Gaza flotilla. Walker claims her desire is to express "solidarity with the children, especially of Palestine" and also, it would appear, to protest against what she termed Israel's "terrorist destruction" of Gaza in January 2009.

Walker struck a parallel between the U.S. civil rights struggle and Israel's "segregation" and "apartheid" policies toward the Palestinians. She charged that Israel's "apartheid wall" is nothing but a "land grab" and "ghettoization" of the Palestinians. This characterization might come as a revolting shock to Israelis (including many on the left) who demanded a security barrier to halt the wave of suicide bombings that then-Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat encouraged after he rejected Israel's offer of Palestinian statehood in 2002.

Walker ignored these basic facts, just as she overlooked the thousands of Israeli children terrorized for years in southern communities by Hamas rocket and mortar fire. But listeners might have expected The Current's host, Anna Maria Tremonti, to raise some critical questions. Not only did Tremonti fail to do so, she actually appeared to encourage Walker to expand on her analogy involving the American civil rights struggle, at one point even noting how "seamless" this analogy is for the author. Tremonti's uncritical acceptance of every word from Walker, demonizing Israel and implying a deliberate policy of racism against the Palestinians, raises important questions for the CBC about what is supposed to be the host's impartiality.

But equally troubling is the fact that, almost a week after the Walker interview (as this column is being filed), The Current has not provided a different perspective on this highly controversial subject. CBC's own journalistic guidelines regarding fairness require as much.

The Current could easily have done this within days of the Walker interview by interviewing an expert or another well-known writer such as the Booker Prize-winning Howard Jacobson. After all, on cnn.com, (June 24), Jacobson wrote an insightful piece, "Why Alice Walker shouldn't sail to Gaza," in response to Walker's "Why I'm sailing to Gaza" (June 21). But, at this point, The Current has ignored the need for balance and fairness, though it must be aware of Jacobson's article just as it would have noted Walker's.

Jacobson challenged Walker's "language of outraged moral purity" and her avoidance of any inconvenient fact such as Hamas' firing of missiles that threaten "the lives of Israeli children." As a liberal, he faults Walker's "highly charged emotionalism [for] disguising an action that, by its very partiality, chooses the Palestinian child over the Israeli."

Unless the CBC provides a counter to Walker's diatribe, it will stand in violation of its own commitment not only to be impartial, but to be seen to be impartial.

The cruise ship Mavi Marmara is towed by a Turkish tugboat as it leaves the Israeli port of Haifa on Aug. 5, 2010. The Mavi Marmara led the flotilla of ships that tried to breach the blockade of Gaza last year. Was second generation member of folk choir

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Ben Shek

A longtime central figure in the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir – and a scholar of Québecois literature as well as a Yiddishist – died June 26 at Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre.

Ben-Zion (Ben) Shek, a former University of Toronto French professor who taught Yiddish at U of T following his retirement, was born in Palestine in 1927.

A second-generation member of the choir, which was founded by Jewish needle-trade workers in 1925, Shek immigrated to Toronto from Lukatch, Poland with his family in 1934. His parents had returned to Europe in 1929.

Shek's father Solomon served as secretary of the Toronto Labour League, a forerunner of the United Jewish People's Order (UJPO), and later became a bookkeeper. His mother, Bella, worked in a dress shop as an alterationist.

In addition to his activities in the choir, Shek served on the board of directors of UJPO Canada.

Choir member Linda Litwack told The CJN that Shek and his wife Jean, who died in 2006, "were essentially running the choir" when she joined it in 1985. He was president of the choir until a few days before his death.

She said that Shek remained active in the community despite a number of hospitalizations over the past year. "We wanted to keep him involved. He always had ideas and the choir was such a passion for him. He had such an active mind…and a great sense of humour."

The choir, French Canadian literature, and Yiddish were among Shek's many passions, Litwack said.

Ester Reiter – a choir member, former UJPO board member and York University academic who is writing a history of the Jewish left in Canada – said that Shek edited the Champion, a left-wing magazine for communists, and taught Yiddish at the Winchevsky Shule as a teenager.

He studied economics and political science at U of T, and worked for a few years as a high school teacher. However, his career path was derailed because his political involvement "did not go over too well in the middle of the Cold War."

He also edited the English section of the Vokhnblat, the Canadian Jewish Weekly, for two brief stints, and was a co-director of Camp Naivelt.

Reiter remembers Shek as "a guy with incredible principles who was completely dedicated to social justice issues, and to the perpetuation of Yiddish.

"What he wanted was a secular, progressive Yiddish, and for us to remember that we came from working class people… and to remember what it's like to be poor, to be discriminated against, and to extend that concern with other people."

Shek's death is "a huge loss to our community," said Maxine Hermolin, executive director of the Winchevsky Centre, of which UJPO is an institution.

Shek leaves his son Elliot and daughter Ghitta. He was predeceased by his wife Jean.

Saboteurs blow up gas pipeline to Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Saboteurs blew up a pipeline carrying gas from Egypt to Israel and Jordan early Monday morning, forcing a shutdown in the flow of gas, Egyptian security sources said.

The explosion took place at a station along the pipeline in the northern Sinai Peninsula at Bir Abd, 60 kilometres east of the Suez Canal, the sources said.

It was the third attack since early February on the pipeline, which supplies natural gas to Israel and Jordan, local cement plants and a power station.

A security source said men in a small truck had machine guns and forced guards at the station to leave. Then they planted explosive charges.

"We do not have sufficient information until now, but in principle, the explosion happened in the same way that the two previous explosions happened," another security source told Reuters.

The natural gas company that runs the pipeline closed it down after the explosion, the source said.

Witnesses said the sound of the explosion boomed out across the desert, frightening nearby residents, and tongues of fire could be seen above the station.

Previous explosions on April 27 and Feb. 5 closed the pipeline for weeks, and another attempt to shut down the line failed in March.

In April, masked gunmen blew up the al-Sabil natural gas terminal near Egypt's border with Israel, sending flames shooting into the air in the early hours of the morning and forcing the shutdown of the country's gas export pipeline to Israel and Jordan.

The month before, another attack hit the same terminal, which is just 50 kilometres from the border with Israel. Gunmen planted explosives at the terminal, but the explosives failed to detonate.

In February, Bedouin tribesmen in the area blew up a section of the pipeline, stopping exports to Israel and Jordan for a month. They also attempted to sabotage the pipeline in July 2010.

Egypt's gas deal with Israel has been the subject of controversy in Egypt and has sparked protests for years.

Strauss-Kahn free from house arrest

JTA

NEW YORK — Dominique Strauss-Kahn, the former director of the International Monetary Fund, was released from house arrest after prosecutors said the hotel maid who accused him of rape lied to a grand jury.

Released June 1 by a judge from his house arrest in New York, Strauss-Kahn may now travel anywhere in the United States. He has a home in Washington D.C., where the IMF is located. He resigned as head of the IMF after he was jailed on charges of sexually assaulting a housekeeper at New York's Sofitel hotel on May 14.

He still faces charges of raping the maid, who reportedly lied to the grand jury about the sequence of events after the alleged attack, and also lied on tax and immigration documents.

Strauss-Kahn's lawyers have called for all charges to be dropped against their client. They do not deny there was sexual encounter. Strauss-Kahn, 62, had been considered a front-runner for the French presidency, the first Jew to hold such a position since World War II.

Hamas refuses German Schalit offer

Hamas rejected a German-mediated offer to free Gilad Schalit that had been accepted by the Israeli government. Hamas political bureau deputy chief Mousa Mohammed Abu Marzouk, in an interview with the Al Hayat newspaper, called the offer "unjust" and said the German mediator "endorsed the unfair and unjust positions of the Zionist government," according to reports. Hamas will no longer negotiate with the German mediator, he added. "There is no chance that the German mediator will return because he is not carrying out his duties and is failing in his mission," Marzouk said. A German government spokesperson confirmed Monday that Israel had accepted the mediator's proposal for the release of Schalit, the Associated Press reported. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said that Israel had accepted the deal and was awaiting Hamas' response. Netanyahu did not specify the terms of the proposal.

Iran tests new missiles

Iran reportedly tested medium- and long-range missiles that are capable of reaching Israel and U.S. bases. Last week's firing of the missiles came on the second day of the Revolutionary Guards' war games. The day before, Iran's military displayed on national television underground missile silos programmed to hit predetermined targets with medium and long-range missiles, including Israel and U.S. bases in the Middle East, in the event of an attack. Gen. Amir Ali Hajizadeh, commander of the Revolutionary Guards Air Force, told the English-language semi-official Iranian news service Fars that the United States and Israel are Iran's only enemies, "and other than that we are not threatened by any nation. Our missile range is designed according to the location of the American bases in the region and that of the Zionist regime."

Jewish groups slam bill banning ritual slaughter

JTA

AMSTERDAM — European Jewish groups slammed a decision by the lower house of the Dutch parliament to ban the ritual slaughter of animals.

The Conference of European Rabbis president, Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt, called the ban an outrage that would prevent Jews from living a Jewish life in the Netherlands.

"We have passed the stage of arguing the nuances of intention of antisemitism. The practical effects of this bill mean that Jews are no longer welcome in the Netherlands. This has not happened for 70 years," Rabbi Goldschmidt said.

Under the bill passed last week, animals must be stunned before slaughter. But both Jewish and Muslim ritual slaughter must be performed while the animal is fully conscious.

"The Netherlands has thrown away centuries of liberalism, human rights, welcome and tolerance for Jews," Rabbi Goldschmidt said. "We will not rest until this discriminatory, intolerant and hateful bill is thrown out."

The upper house still must approve the measure, which is being protested by Holland's Jewish and Muslim communities as an attack on their religious freedom. Some 40,000 Jews and about one million Muslims live in the country.

European Jewish Congress president Moshe Kantor said in a statement last week that his organization could take legal action to prevent the ban, pointing out that it violates Article 9 of the European Convention on Human Rights, the right to freedom of religion

"We cannot let such a blatantly discriminatory law stand without fighting it, especially as it stands contrary to European standards and freedoms," Kantor said,

"This is a dark day for the Jewish community," he added. "This could serve as a terrible precedent for other parts of Europe and tells the Jews that they and their customs are no longer welcome."

The bill was put forward by the Animal Rights Party, which claims that stunning before slaughter causes less pain to the animal.

The Jewish and Muslim communities have a year to prove otherwise or the law goes into effect.

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) also condemned the Dutch vote.

"Dutch Jews must not be put to the choice of violating a central tenet of Judaism, foregoing fresh meat, or emigrating. We call upon the Dutch senate to prevent this action from leading to a clear violation of religious freedom that has a disproportionate impact on the Jewish community," said Abraham Foxman, ADL national director.

The European Union requires animals to be stunned before slaughter, but makes exceptions for religiously mandated ritual slaughter. Nevertheless, ritual slaughter is banned in Luxembourg, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland.

Hamas condemns Greece's decision

The flotilla ships anchored in Greek ports were to depart Monday. The decision was made on Saturday, and all passengers were instructed to board the boats with their belongings and prepare for the journey. The announcement did not indicate the destination.

Meanwhile, the Hamas terrorist group in Damascus condemned the Greek government's treatment of the flotilla saying that it is "an inhuman act" that "goes against international law." Hamas said the decision to keep the flotilla ships in port "was the result of pressure by the Zionist conquerors." Hamas called on the EU and human rights organizations "to exert pressure" on the Greek government to allow the ships to sail.

Israeli-born Swedish citizen Dror Feiler, a passenger on the American ship, said: "Last year, we got close to Gaza. This year, I hope we will get even closer. The journey has just started. The authorities are against us, but the people are with us."

On the island of Crete, the Greek coast guard prevented the Canadian ship Tahrir from sailing and confiscated all its documents.

Asper Foundation trains Arab women for work

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Canadian philanthropist and CanWest Global Communications director Gail Asper hopes that a new entrepreneurial program will empower Arab women in east Jerusalem to join the workforce and contribute to a "peaceful society" in Israel.

Gail Asper

Speaking to The CJN in Jerusalem during a weeklong meeting of the Hebrew University's board of governors – a position Asper joked she inherited from her late father, Izzy Asper, in 2002 – she said she was happy to facilitate a project that would bring Jews and Arabs together for a common goal.

In 2007, the Asper Center for Entrepreneurship at Hebrew University of Jerusalem joined forces with the Al-Quds Dialogue Center, a non-political organization in east Jerusalem created and chaired by an Arab entrepreneur named Fuad Abu Hamed.

The result was the east Jerusalem BizCamp – modelled after the Curry BizCamp of Entrepreneurship in Winnipeg – which was meant to provide young Arabs, including women from east Jerusalem, with the opportunity to gain experience and learn skills needed to start a business.

She said that while the BizCamp was a success that assisted young Arabs with their entrepreneurial goals, most of the male participants refused to work with women.

"So we decided, let's just work with the women," Asper said.

A three-year Empowerment Through Entrepreneurship program, set to launch in the near future with the help of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, was established to provide Arab women with the opportunity to train for the workforce and become contributing members of Israeli society.

Asper said she was motivated to reach out to Arab women because while nearly 58 per cent of Jewish women in Israel are working, only 20 per cent of Arab women are in the workforce.

She said some of the factors that keep Arab women from entering the workforce are lack of support from their families, no daycare options for their young children and inaccessible public transportation in Arab villages.

"[Jerusalem] is a city that has major poverty issues... It is a challenged city. But all the stats show that if you get the women educated and out there working... that is the path towards a peaceful society," she said.

But Asper realized that training wouldn't be enough to foster change because the social and financial challenges that deter Arab women from participating would also have to be addressed.

"What good does it do to show them the sky and not give them the resources to fly?" Asper asked.

She wanted to ensure that the Empowerment Through Entrepreneurship program would provide the participants with scholarships, computer training, peer and networking support, as well as childcare.

There is no doubt that having an increase in employment will help boost Israel's economy – which has been growing by five per cent each year since 2008 – but this initiative could also have societal implications.

"Women who are more educated are going to be more global in their outlook... They're going to want to reach out. They're going to be inclined to want to be a part of Israeli society."

She said there is a lot of interest from women who want to get involved in the program.

"They're sharp, they've got a lot of ideas, their kids are a little older and all they need is someone investing in them and believing in them."

Israel extends daylight saving time

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Israeli cabinet has approved a move to extend daylight saving time.

The unanimous decision extends daylight time from the Friday of the last week in March to the first Sunday after Oct. 1.

The decision comes following a recommendation by an advisory committee commissioned by Interior Minister Eli Yishai of the Orthodox Shas party.

The issue came to a head last summer when the clocks were changed in mid-September and Yom Kippur fell early. Israel changed to standard time two months before the United States last year.

Religious groups have called for the change back to standard time to take place before Yom Kippur so that the fast ends earlier. It's also difficult to change the clocks later than early October because sunrise comes too late to allow observant Jews to participate in morning prayers before they have to go to work.

"Extending daylight saving time will promote better co-ordination with Europe's economic clock, extend daylight hours and save electricity and resources for the Israeli economy," a statement from the Prime Minister's Office said.

Research at Hebrew U could lead to cancer cure

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

In the three years since the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University pledged to raise $50 million to support a new medical research institute at the Jerusalem university, the world-renowned scientists and researchers have never looked back.

In 2008, CFHU, a non-profit organization that promotes and raises funds for Hebrew University, took on its most ambitious project to back the Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada (IMRIC).

The institute, housed on the Ein Kerem medical campus, is meant to encourage interdisciplinary partnerships to help scientists better understand how to prevent and combat diseases such as cancer, Alzheimer's disease and Parkinson's disease.

As the name of the institute suggests, Israel's most brilliant scientific minds partner with some of Canada's best and brightest.

For example, Hebrew University professor and IMRIC researcher Chaim Cedar, who was recently presented with the Canada Gairdner International Award for his groundbreaking work on DNA methylation, partnered with McGill University's Moshe Szyf, a Hebrew U graduate.

Based on a basic chemical process that turns parts of each cell's genetic code on and off (methylation), Cedar developed a theory that healthy cells can "switch" into cancerous ones.

The idea is that if methylation can be stopped, or prevented, so, too, can cancer.

Another Hebrew University genetics and biochemistry professor, Abraham Fainsod, made a recent discovery that could help curb the devastating effects of Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorder (FASD).

Fainsod, who has since partnered with the University of Manitoba's Geoff Hicks, discovered that introducing vitamin A to an embryo that has been exposed to alcohol in the womb could prevent some of the devastating effects to the development of the head and central nervous system.

During a visit to the IMRIC facilities late last month, a group of Canadian Hebrew University board of governors heard from another IMRIC scientist who has been making headlines for his cancer research.

Rotem Karni, a researcher at IMRIC's department of biochemistry and molecular biology, did his best to sum up years of research and experiments in 10 minutes, Karni explained that he and his research team discovered that preventing or inhibiting a certain protein called hnRNP A2/B1 from developing could be used as a treatment against cancer.

There are three areas of cancer research: detection, treatment, and a cure, Karni said. Clearly, he added, we are losing the war against cancer.

"We have a problem with detection, we don't have enough good, early markers to detect the cancer before we get big tumours that are already in the body," Karni said.

"We don't have very efficient treatments, as you know, and we can't cure most patients."

However, Karni said, his team was able to focus on specific genes that control the process of manufacturing proteins in cells.

"In my post-doc, I discovered a whole group of genes of proteins, which are involved in a very important process of making proteins that make cancer," he said.

"This wasn't known about before... Now we are the only group in the world that is working on this group of cells in cancer, in a certain type of brain tumour and in breast cancer metastases."

Karni said they discovered that a specific protein was highly expressed in a kind of brain tumour, and the protein could serve as a marker for this disease.

"But it's not just a marker for the disease. It can also predict what will happen to the patient," Karni said.

He added that as part of their research, they followed the progress of cancer patients. Those who showed high levels of that protein had a much lower survival rate than cancer patients who showed lower levels of the protein.

"If we can inhibit this gene, if we can silence it, we can prevent these glioblastoma [brain tumours] from developing," Karni said.

The same protein is also present in the late stages of breast cancer, which then commonly metastasizes into the lungs, he said.

"But if we block the expression of this gene we can block the breast cancer metastases," and prevent the spread of the cancer to the lungs.

Karni's years of research has yielded a technology that can inhibit the protein linked to brain and breast cancers.

Karni's team has developed a drug that can be injected directly into the tumour, to bypass the blood barrier in the brain.

His team is currently researching whether they can reverse a developed tumour, in addition to preventing one, said Karni, adding that he is collaborating with other research companies to develop a cure.

A painting called Candy's Field of Dreams was recently dedicated in the lobby of the main entrance at Sunnybrook Hospital, in memory of Candy Schaffel Black, who died of cancer in early January. The painting made by her friend, Joy Shepherd, a few months before Shaffel Black died was donated to the hospital as a final gift from Shepherd. Seen in the photo from left are Joy Shepherd and Candy's daughters, Arly, Shira and Estee.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Roundtable brings together innovators in brain research

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Entrepreneurs from Ontario and Israel gathered last week to discuss possible collaborations for developing commercially viable products to diagnose and treat brain disorders.

Representatives of 26 Ontario corporations and 10 Israeli firms met at the Ontario-Israel Bilateral Roundtable on Brain Research at the St. Andrew's Club and Conference Centre in Toronto's Sun Life Financial Tower.

Hosted by the Canada-Israel Industrial Research & Development Foundation (CIIRDF) and the Ontario Brain Institute, the gathering marks the first time "both sides launched strategic initiatives and decided that strategic partners would be the other side," said CIIRDF president Henri Rothschild.

"Ontario is Plan A for Israel and Israel is Plan A for Ontario," he said.

The meeting brought together small and medium enterprises with expertise on the latest developments in brain research. The expectation is that partnerships may arise to build on each side's strengths, leading to advances in treating neurological disorders like depression, autism, Alzheimer's and Parkinson's disease.

Some 70 one-on-one meetings were scheduled for the two-day conference. Viable collaborative proposals are eligible for grants, funded by the governments of Israel and Ontario, to a maximum of $600,000 each, Rothschild said.

Henri Rothschild

"Downstream, these jointly developed innovations could improve the quality of life for the hundreds of millions of people affected by [neurological] diseases and help innovators on both sides of the ocean to capitalize on the $23-billion global neuro device and diagnostics market," stated a CIIRDF news release.

Commenting on the gathering, Joseph Rotman, founding chair of the Ontario Brain Institute and chair of the conference, said, "The roundtable helps to position Ontario as an international hub for neuro devices and diagnostics R & D and commercialization – and as a partner for choice for global leaders in brain research."

"This roundtable represents another key milestone in Ontario's innovation agenda and reinforces our government's commitment to foster world-class brain research in the province," said Glen Murray, the Ontario minister of research and innovation, in a statement. "Working together, we will create new jobs, reduce health-care costs and improve the quality of life for those who suffer from brain diseases in Ontario, Israel and around the world."

Rafi Gidron, CEO of the Brain Research International Center in Israel, delivered one of the conference's keynote presentations. He credited Israeli President Shimon Peres for lending his prestige and influence to the focus on brain research.

"With strong leadership from President Shimon Peres, focused investment and commitment to replicate our achievements in fields such as nanotechnology, we have established a powerful vision for brain research in Israel," said Gidron, a founder of Chromatis, which was sold to Lucent for $4.8 billion (US) in 2000. "Our collaboration with Ontario will help us to achieve key R&D objectives, respond to the urgent need for new diagnostics and treatments and accelerate the developments and commercialization of promising neurological innovations."

Rothschild said, "Peres has always been at the next wave [of technological developments]. He's got this wonderful vision, and to him, Israel is so strong in medical research, clinical work and high-tech that it could be applied to brain research."

In a letter read to the roundtable, Peres stated: "I believe brain research today represents the new frontier in scientific and medical technology, bringing with it a vision of a world where brain degenerative diseases such as Alzheimer's will be a thing of the past and in which the blind will see light. Advances in the field will transcend borders and bring hope to humankind for a better tomorrow, deciphering so many brain-related secrets as yet undisclosed."

During a visit to Israel last year by Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty, Peres suggested the two sides collaborate in this field. The suggestion fit in nicely with the desire of Ontario to forge business relationships with Israel, and with the creation last November of the Ontario Brain Institute, the stage was set for last week's roundtable, Rothschild said.

"We're poised to make breakthroughs," he added.

Sleepy Israeli town to replicate Lugano

Noam Dvir
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The story of Chinese developers who built an exact replica of the Austrian village of Hallstatt on the outskirts of Guandong has circulated widely in the international media.

Thousands of kilometres to the west, Israel launched its own project in architectural replication: the Bella Lugano quarter in Yehud. Inspired by the Italian-speaking section of this Swiss city, the project is the brainchild of Mayor Yossi Ben David, who became well acquainted with Italy while working in his previous job in textiles.

"European cities have a special magic," he said. "We are going to do something which has never been done anywhere in Israel – it'll be a tourist centre, a recreation centre, it'll have public plazas with cafes and nice shops, filled with life."

The Lugano project has attracted media attention in recent years, first as an object of curiosity and later as a serious endeavour aimed at generating urban renewal in central Yehud (meanwhile renamed Yehud-Monoson). It would not be far-fetched to call it the biggest and most ambitious project of its kind in Israel today.

The old centre of Yehud, built on the ruins of the Arab village of Yehudia, suffers from many of the syndromes that typically afflict downtown areas in Israel. It is outdated, neglected and hard-pressed to compete with the successful mall that opened a few years ago in nearby Kiryat Savionim. All attempts to resuscitate it, including establishing a pedestrian mall, have failed.

As part of the renewal project that will encompass 200 dunams (49.4 acres), the old downtown will be completely demolished except for the spire of a mosque from the old village of Yehudia and a tomb from the Mameluke period. Two apartment towers will be built and between them – the jewel in the crown – the Italian quarter with picturesque four- and five-storey residential buildings. The ground floors will contain shops and feature ornamented colonnades and neoclassical columns. The building fronts will be painted in shades of orange, peach and lavender, and combine European motifs with Israeli sun porches.

Residents and visitors will be able to relax in big and small squares replete with trees and fountains. "It's a combination of all kinds of things that I like," Ben David said. "There are elements borrowed from all sorts of places in Europe, not just Lugano. These are basic urban elements that have worked well for thousands of years. We are creating something new out of them."

Urban planner/architect reignites a debate

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

"I think it's touched a raw nerve," said Ken Greenberg, the Toronto architect and urban designer.

Judging by the critics' reactions, Greenberg's newly published book, Walking Home: The Life and Lessons of a City Builder (Random House), has reinvigorated an already heated debate on the future of the city in North America.

The flight of city dwellers to suburbs after World War II, facilitated by the automobile and the cheap price of gas, was a historic development that unfolded at the expense of cities.

Suburbanization prompted observers to conclude that cities were in a state of decline.

But in recent years, the escalating price of gasoline – which could well reach $3 a litre within five years, in his estimation – and the spectre of global warming have forced a reappraisal of this complex issue.

In his thought provoking book, Greenberg – the founding director of the division of architecture and urban design in Toronto's planning and development department – puts his case in perspective.

"Cities at their best provide much of what we seek in a place to call home: community, places of culture and business that we can walk to, mass transit, and a wealth of amenities that couldn't be supported without a city's density.

"The post-war drive to suburbanization deprived us of these inherent advantages of urban living. The realization of this loss ... has made us see cities with fresh eyes. As a result of a new found respect for their inherent capacities, cities and city building have again become our urgent priorities. They are making a comeback."

Walking Home, Greenberg observes, is a two-pronged examination of how cities fell from grace and how they can resurrect themselves.

Greenberg, whose projects here and abroad have focused on rejuvenating downtowns, waterfronts and neighbourhoods, believes we're in the early stages of another great transformation. Having glorified suburbs for the past six decades, we are now in the midst of returning to our roots in the city.

"The primary driver is the cost of energy," he said in an interview at his home and office in a downtown three-storey condominium with a magnificent view of Toronto's skyscrapers.

"We're into a peak oil period," noted Greenberg, the principal of Greenberg Consultants Inc. "This is a profound game changer."

Beyond the pain consumers are feeling at the pump, the new appreciation for the city is propelled by mounting concerns about public health and the environment.

The radical increase in obesity, diabetes and heart disease can, in large part, be traced back to the sedentary lifestyle of the suburb, explained Greenberg. "In the suburbs, with their wide open spaces, you're not in a walkable milieu."

The millions of drivers who commute from suburb to city have wreaked havoc on our air quality, he said. "We're worse than Los Angeles in average commuting times. The congestion is costing billions of dollars. The ideal of the car-oriented suburb is becoming obsolete."

Due to these factors, we're at a tipping point in terms of whether Canadians want to live in cities rather than suburbs.

In his view, the trends seem unmistakable. Toronto has one of the fastest growing urban populations on the continent. "Toronto, in a way, is the poster child for all these changes," he said.

Ken Greenberg

Citing the Toronto suburb of Mississauga as an example, he predicted that Canadian suburbs will become more like cities.

Asked whether cities can thrive as real estate prices sizzle and set new records, Greenberg said the problem can be resolved if Canada adopts a credible housing policy and if municipalities demand affordable housing in so-called "inclusionary zones."

Greenberg, who was born in New York City in 1944 and settled in Toronto in 1968 as a draft dodger from the Vietnam war, has seen dramatic changes in the urban landscape since coming to Canada.

His own neigbourhood, near Bathurst and King, has been transformed, having made the amazing passage from desolation to vibrancy in only 11 years.

To Greenberg, an avid cyclist, a liveable city offers untold advantages.

"You can do more things when commuting is not factored into the equation. Almost everything, from shops to schools, is at your fingertips. This is especially important for seniors. You're in closer proximity to other people, which gives you a sense of sharing the city and public places with neighbours."

He liked Toronto from the moment he got here 43 years ago.

"I found it welcoming and generous and was grateful to be here," said Greenberg, who has worked on some of Toronto's most interesting and high-profile public projects, from the construction of Harbourfront and the revitalization of the St. Lawrence Market historic district to the renewal of Ryerson University's campus. "Toronto is not flashy, but on a livability index, it comes up high."

When he looks back at what passed for progress in Toronto, he grows animated. "We abused and devalued our city," declared Greenberg, whose Israeli-born second wife, Eti, teaches tai chi at the Jewish Community Centre at Bloor and Spadina.

"We rammed big expressways through the heart of the city, creating gashes in the cityscape and destroying old neighbourhoods. Urban renewal projects degenerated into slums. Malls, such as the Eaton Centre, basically killed the street-related stores we value so much today."

Mistakes are still being made, he claimed. "Our standards for street design are still tilted far too much to make car movements a priority. And we're still struggling with antiquated zoning laws."

But if Greenberg has his way, the city as we know it today will undergo a renaissance, with all its positive and uplifting implications.

The paranoid world of conspiracy theorists

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Jews control the world. Israel harvests the internal organs of murdered Palestinians. German Jews were conspiring to pollute the Aryan bloodline. Barack Obama was born outside the United States. The Mossad warned Jews not to go to their offices at the World Trade Centre in New York City on Sept. 11, 2001. Vaccines are bad for you.

As crazy and far-fetched as these claims sound, they are treated as the gospel truth by the tenacious and self-assured band of conspiracy theorists.

Jonathan Kay, a Toronto journalist affiliated with the National Post, writes about this peculiar, even dangerous, subculture in a book with a long-winded title but concise message.

AMONG THE TRUTHERS
A Journey Into the Growing Conspiracist Underground of 9/11 Truthers, Birthers, Armageddonites, Vaccine Hysterics, Hollywood Know-Nothings and Internet Addicts
JONATHAN KAY

In Among the Truthers: A Journey into the Growing Conspiracist Underground of 9/11 Truthers, Birthers, Armageddonites, Vaccine Hysterics, Hollywood Know-Nothings and Internet Addicts (HarperCollins), Kay introduces readers to a strange breed.

According to Kay, the conspiracy theory movement, once almost entirely the province of antisemites, has become a mass phenomenon in the past decade, spawning dozens of websites, books, conferences and even a pseudo-academic journal.

A conservative writer, he ascribes its popularity to the mood of our times: "The institutions that we once counted on to discourage radicalism and guide our society toward common ground – organized religion, a vibrant academy, an influential mainstream media, and a respected central government – no longer command the public trust."

Given these circumstances, conspiracy theorists, have filled the void. As he puts it, "The result of all this is nothing less than a countercultural rift in the fabric of consensual American reality, a gaping cognitive hole into which has leaped a wide range of political paranoiacs previously consigned to the lunatic fringe – Larouchites, UFO nuts, libertarian survivalists, Holocaust deniers and a thousand other groups besides."

Being a rational and sensible person, Kay takes them seriously. Their notions bump up against the hard shoals of reality, but their "disturbing habits of mind" – nihilistic distrust in government, total alienation from mainstream politics, a need to reduce complexity to simplicity and a rejection of logical discourse – are threats to our civilization.

As Kay deftly demonstrates, conspiracy theories have a long pedigree, and thrive in chaotic conditions.

During the early 19th century, Jews and Freemasons, figured prominently in European conspiracies about the origins of the French Revolution. But in the United States, the Populist movement was in the forefront of disseminating such half-baked theories, capitalizing on the collapse of food, commodity and land prices in the 1890s.

In the 20th century, conspiracists on the extreme right, notably Adolf Hitler, built a philosophy on the foundations of antisemitism. His far left counterparts, whether in the Soviet Union or elsewhere, portrayed capitalists as parasites bent on fleecing the working class.

Today, conspiracists are divided into two irreconcilable camps, Kay notes.

"Radical leftists believe that the totalitarian and cryptocratic forces plotting to take over the world are oil magnates, uniformed Dr. Strangeloves, CIA spooks and the like, while radical rightists imagine a world run by the United Nations, the European Union, the International Criminal Court and the North America Free Trade Agreement."

Sadly, antisemitism has loomed large in this movement. "Not all conspiracy theorists are antisemitic," he observes. "But all conspiracy movements – all of them – attract antisemites."

Russian antisemites seized on the first Zionist Congress, in Basel, Switzerland, in 1897, to propagate their noxious views.

Grotesquely twisting Zionism into a grand theory about the Jewish quest for global domination, they concocted a fairy tale known as The Protocols of the Elders of Zion. This tract, eagerly pounced on by the Nazis and their fellow travellers, was anything but original.

As Kay points out, it was a plagiarized amalgam of Biarritz, a lurid antisemitic novel published in Germany, and Dialogues in Hell between Machiavelli and Montesquieu, a propaganda treatise written by a French lawyer.

Kay's assessment of the Protocols is succinct but telling: "Like all successful conspiracy theories, it was a lie that people wanted to hear. This was a moment when Europe had just endured not one, but two epic upheavals, neither of which had a simple, comprehensible cause."

Although Jews were rarely found in the conspiracy movement in its formative decades, they are just as likely to embrace its theories today as to be targeted by them, Kay says.

Right-wing Jews who subscribe to hardline Zionist positions and believe that U.S. President Obama is a Muslim and plotting to destroy Israel are members of the conspiracy school.

On the left, Kay singles out Jews like Naomi Klein, the anti-globalization author of The Shock Doctrine: The Rise of Disaster Capitalism, and Diana Ralph, the co-founder of Independent Jewish Voices.

He is scathing about both of them.

"Klein's increasingly radicalized hunt for corporate demons launched her into the realm of full-fledged conspiratorial fantasy," he writes.

Ralph, in a 2006 essay, claimed that 9/11, was carried out not by Al Qaeda but by U.S. and Israeli conservatives intent on implementing "a secret, strategic plan" to ensure Washington's unilateral superpower status.

Kay places Kevin Barrett, an American polemecist, in his crosshairs as well.

A PhD in African languages and literature and a convert to Islam, Barrett is viscerally anti-Israeli, having branded Israel as a "genocidal settler colonial state in Palestine."

Kay says Barrett is also a "Holocaust skeptic," a person who thinks that the Holocaust, as taught in the United States, is "a hideously destructive myth."

In closing, Kay admits that the experience of writing Among the Truthers fundamentally changed him, moderating his attitude toward politics and his judgment of others.

As he observes, "It has made me more self-aware when I bend the rules of logic in the service of ideology or partisanship."

If only his subjects in the conspiracy movement could draw the same conclusions.

The Yiddish bubbie with the rugelach

Shel Goldstein who plays Celia, and David Simor who plays Noam

The character of Celia, the Yiddish bubbie who bakes rugelach throughout the play Through the Tulips, is what writer and director Naomi Tessler thinks will bring the play to life for the audience.

"She's a riot," she said. "She beats her own drum and she's vibrant."

Tessler began writing the play by creating the character of Celia, who is based on her grandmother, and she said it grew from there. She said the play was easier for her to write than anything she's written before because she drew from her personal experiences.

"It seemed to just flow really easily," she said. "Each of the characters has a piece of myself in it, so it just came to life."

Three of the five characters in Through the Tulips are Jewish, and at one point they sit shivah. However, Tessler added, the play has "something anyone can relate to, regardless of whether or not they've tried rugelach before."

She said one of her favourite moments in the play is when Celia dances through tulips while singing Tiptoe Through the Tulips. Tessler also likes the part in which Celia tells a joke that her own late grandmother told.

Tessler, the founder and artistic director of Branch Out Theatre Company, has never been part of the Toronto Fringe Festival before other than as an audience member, and she realizes that having her play in the festival is a great opportunity.

"It's a festival that brings so much colour to any city that it comes to," she said. "I was very excited to have a vehicle to show my play."

She said she is particularly excited to have seven shows at the Factory Studio Theatre, adding that the theatre has beautiful sound and lighting.

Tessler has written a play about her experiences with different cultures in India and Japan, but she said that Through the Tulips is different because it's more personal. It began as an assignment for a playwriting class – to write a scene with the theme of magic realism – she took at New York University.

"I used the magic I've seen in Jewish culture as well as the magic I see in different healing practices, such as reiki, to inspire me," Tessler said.

The play is set in an urban garden filled with tulips and is about a mystic helping a widow contact her dead husband. She said the play is dedicated to her grandmother and all the other elderly people she's met who have enriched her life.

"Some amazing elderly people... have touched my life and inspired me to do this," Tessler said.

Through the Tulips runs from July 6 through 17 on Wednesdays, Friday and weekends. For more information, go to www.fringetoronto.com.

Some Fringe listings

The Toronto Fringe Festival is a 12-day annual theatre festival featuring up-and-coming artists. This year, more than 40 productions are presented. Following is a selection of the plays that may be of interest to the Jewish community.

Pitch Blond

This is Laura Harris' one-woman show about Jewish comedic actor Judy Holliday, who was famous for playing dumb blonds. The play focuses on Holliday's testimony before the U.S. House Committee on UnAmerican Activities in 1952.

Harris got the idea for the play from one of her professors, who said she had a Judy Holliday quality. She wasn't familiar with Holliday, but after doing some research, she fell in love with her.

"I underestimated how antisemitic this period of U.S. history was, with so many Jewish performers being suspected of Communist activities," Harris said. "I also think that this character is a Jewish icon."

Total Verrükt

Joanna Caplan wrote this play after she became fascinated with art and theatre that was created in concentration camps during World War II. The play takes its name from the final performance of a play at the Westerbork camp, and it's based on that event.

Creating this play was a personal experience for her, Caplan said. "I'm Jewish, and this piece is my journey with what it means to be a Jewish woman today."

Her goal in submitting her play to the Fringe was to get a venue to share what she feels is an important and beautiful story. "It reminds us that in the face of utter destruction and horror, there can be beauty and creativity," she said.

Living with Henry

This musical drama explores what it means to live with HIV. It was created by Christopher Wilson and features Jewish actor Lizzie Kurtz, who said that everyone can relate to this play. "There isn't anyone who hasn't been affected by HIV even if indirectly. It's cross-generational and cross-cultural," she said.

Kurtz plays Jenny, the lead character's best friend. She said that it's a great experience to play Jenny and be part of the Fringe Festival.

"I've had the amazing opportunity to take part in the refinement [of the play] and be part of the creative collective," Kurtz said.

Volleyball star playing on the international circuit

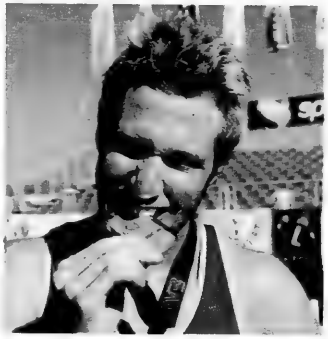
Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It was about one year ago that Sam Schachter teamed up with Garrett May to stun the international beach volleyball community by winning the Under-21 world championship in Turkey.

Since then, Schachter has been living the life of a global jetsetter and international man of renown, travelling to Prague, Switzerland, Germany, Guatemala, Brazil and China for competitions.

Truth be told, his is not a five-star lifestyle. With the meager, subsistence sum he receives as a member of the national team, he's more likely to stay at a Motel 6 than the Ritz. But the vagabond lifestyle hasn't stopped him from racking up more success internationally.

Teaming this time with Maverick Hatch, the duo has finished fifth at an event in Germany, lost in the second round at a qualifier in Brazil and China and qualified for the playoff round in Prague, only to lose to the United States' top team.



Sam Schachter checks the gold in his Under-21 championship gold medal.

There was also a ninth place finish at a national event in Germany and a second in Switzerland.

"We've had a pretty successful year so far," Schachter said during a recent conversation from his home in Canada.

Pretty successful considering they're a young team playing in their first year "on the tour," competing against more established players, he explained.

Last year, before he and May took the beach volleyball world by storm, he had no world ranking. This year, he and Hatch are 53rd. "We're getting up there now," he said.

They're ranked fourth in Canada, "but in my mind, me and Maverick believe we're the best team in Canada right now.

"I feel we have the ability to beat any of the [other teams]."

Schachter, who was voted junior athlete of the year at the Canadian Sports Awards in 2010, said of the past season, "For sure we've progressed.

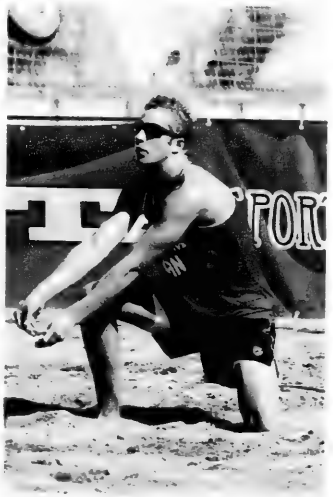
"We've improved much more mentally. We know what we need to do to improve."

What sets apart elite players from others is "they really excel in the mental game. Watching them perform has taught us a lot. It's a learning experience for us," he said.

Racking up points at events sanctioned by FIVB, the international volleyball federation, and NORCECA, a regional association, is his summertime goal. "We hope to break into the 40s," he said.

Schachter is penciling-in competitions in Quebec and British Columbia, and they'll have to choose to attend one event either in Poland, Austria or Finland.

Financial considerations will limit him and Hatch to one of the foreign events and so, of course, they're actively looking for sponsors to help defray the costs associated with international competitions. For more information, contact Schachter's manager, Kendra Squibb, at kendrasquibb@gmail.com.



Sam Schachter "digs" the ball.

Former Blue Jays player Shawn Green turns his talents to writing

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Shawn Green, the former Toronto Blue Jays' right fielder, was arguably the finest Jewish professional baseball player since Sandy Koufax and Hank Greenberg.

When he retired in 2008, after 15 years in the Major Leagues, Green had compiled an enviable record. He had a batting average of .282 and had batted in 328 home runs. He also had set or tied four records, including hitting four home runs in a single game.

Shawn Green

Three years on, he has turned his talents to another field, having written a guide to a well-balanced and fulfilled life, The Way of Baseball: Finding Stillness at 95 MPH, published by Simon & Schuster.

"I love to write," said Green, a tall, rangy, athletic-looking man who co-wrote the book with journalist Gordon McAlpine.

Part spiritual journey, part philosophical study and part sports memoir, his 208-page book is ultimately a primer about living in the moment and letting go of anxieties and regrets about the past.

The mindful and meditative approach Green has followed since being a teenager has helped him immeasurably, on and off the baseball diamond.

Twice an All-Star selection, Green, 39, played for the Blue Jays from 1993 to 1999 and then for the Los Angeles Dodgers (2000-2004), Arizona Diamondbacks (2005-2006) and New York Mets (2006-2007).

"Toronto is where I learned to play the game," he said in an interview here to promote his book. "The fans were really forgiving and my teammates were like brothers."

When he was drafted by the Blue Jays, Green was a student at Stanford University on a baseball scholarship majoring in psychology. After signing up with the Blue Jays, he spent almost two years in the minors perfecting his craft.

Though he showed flashes of greatness in his first few years in Toronto, it was not until 1998 that he won a spot on the team's lineup.

Until then, his record could probably be described as hit-and-miss. "There were definitely some down times," he recalled, saying he was hard-pressed to get out of bed on some days. "There were highs and lows as I tried to establish myself and get more playing time."

During his darkest periods, when he was struggling to prove himself, Green drew on his concept of mindfulness to confront challenges and live up to fans' expectations.

Once he hit his stride, becoming the first Blue Jay to hit 30 or more home runs and steal 30 or more bases in the same season, he was recognized as a star.

Aside from establishing himself as a stellar player in Toronto, Green connected with his Jewish identity here.

"In Toronto, I learned much more about what it means to be Jewish," said Green, who was born in Illinois and raised in a secular home in California. "The team doctor, Glenn Copeland, took me to shul at Beth Tzedec and introduced me to the rabbi."

Like Greenberg and Koufax before him, the day came when Green had to choose between baseball and his Jewish faith.

Though he is not very observant, he decided to sit out an important game on Yom Kippur. "I wanted to acknowledge my respect for my Jewish heritage," he writes in The Way of Baseball. In addition, he welcomed the opportunity to be a role model to Jewish kids, he said in an interview. "Koufax told me you got to do what you believe in."

He has no regrets of having fallen tantalizingly short of equalling Greenberg's 331 career home runs. "He was an unbelievable player, and to be only three home runs shy of him is unbelievable."

Alhough Green was exceedingly popular as a player, he had to learn to cope with isolated outbursts of anti-semitism.

"A fan in San Francisco gave me the heil Hitler salute. That was the most upsetting incident. Once in a while, I heard a player making a Jewish joke. I just bit my tongue. I didn't want to blow it up. Every Jewish player has experienced that in one way or another."

He realizes that players like Greenberg, who hit his prime in the 1930s, had to put up with much worse verbal abuse. "It's amazing how the world has changed since then. It's a good thing how different everything is now."

His grandfather knew a thing or two about antisemitism, too, having anglicized Greenberg to Green in the 1940s.

Green's father, Ira, a salesman who played college basketball in Chicago, encouraged him to pursue his love of baseball. As Green remembers, he was swinging a bat at the age of three and playing organized baseball by the age of seven.

He retired when he was reportedly earning $9.5 million a year.

"The constant travel was too much," explained Green, who lives in southern California's Orange county with his wife, Lindsay, and two daughters, Presley and Chandler. "I miss the game, but my kids would cry every time I left home."

These days, Green is "messing around" with several "entrepreneurial ventures" and planning to start a sports website this summer.

Although he has yet to visit Israel, he plans to do so in the not-too-distant future.

"It would be a trip I'd love to do. Israel, for all Jews, is a source of pride. It's home, even though Jews live all over the world. It's our country. It gives you a sense of ownership."

"Israel keeps hanging in there, despite all its challenges," he added, referring to its current political and military problems.

A journey from criminal to youth advocate

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

Joshua Stern is a modern-day jack-of-all-trades. In addition to working as a writer, musician and restaurateur, he's also been an addict, a misfit and a thief.

The 35-year-old is eager to share his extraordinary journey from criminal to youth advocate in his yet-to-be published autobiography titled A Mother's Love: The Visits That Saved My Life.

Stern, who says he was raised in a strict Jewish family in Toronto, had ideas about what he wanted to do with his life that didn't jibe with his parents' wishes.

"As a kid, I had a lot of my own ideas and goals that were not in conjunction with what my family saw for me, and it caused a lot of tension," he recalls. "My family was very loving and supportive, as long as you were doing what they thought was right."

Much to his relatives' dismay, Stern hoped to become a professional athlete.

"I had some very lofty dreams that many people didn't support, and I felt like an outcast. So I started to get into trouble," he says.

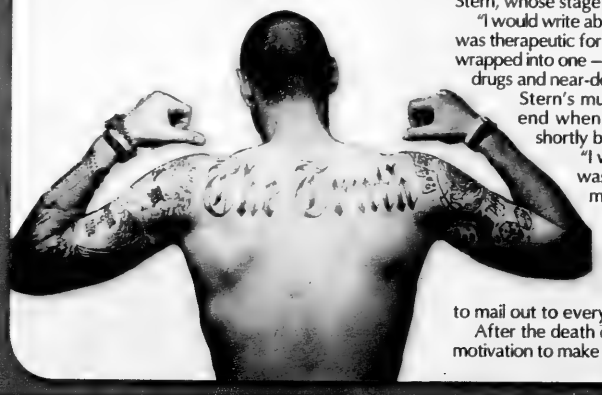
"On top of that, I had a strange connection with the supernatural from a very young age. I would tell my family about my premonitions at Shabbat dinner. My father was very much a realist, so that just put me in the 'crazy' category fast."

When Stern attended Highland Junior High in Toronto's northeast end, things took a turn for the worse.

"I felt a lot of abuse as a Jewish kid in a predominantly non-Jewish school. I got teased a lot. Every antisemitic thing you could ever think of, I would get non-stop for three years."

At the same time, Stern felt he was never fully accepted by the Jewish community, either.

"I was athletic, I had a tattoo, I didn't care about school, and I dressed differently. I didn't follow all the rules," he says. "So I felt very isolated. I would eat lunch alone in the school bathroom, and it made me a very aggressive and hateful person. I didn't have a group I could call my own. The only group that became my own was criminals."



At 15, Stern was sent to live in a youth services group home, which he describes as "prison for kids."

"I went in there for relatively minor things like skipping class, but when I got there, it was full of young, hardened criminals. There were drug dealers, prostitutes."

While he was at the home, one of the social workers attempted to sexually assault him and two other kids. "My parents never talked about it with me afterwards," Stern recalls. "I met with a prosecutor by myself."

Stern ran away from the group home shortly after that, and eventually moved back in with his parents. When he finished high school, Stern moved to Los Angeles, where he says he transitioned from a "petty criminal" to a "major gangster."

"We get this version of L.A., as some beautiful, luxurious place where the stars live. But in actuality, the underbelly of Los Angeles is far greater than any of the glitter and glam. There's a lot of broken dreams," Stern says.

"I met a lot of people while I was there. We were growing and trafficking [drugs], all kinds of stuff. I was in prison briefly. You leave L.A., and wonder if your time there was even real."

After nearly five years, Josh returned to Toronto fearing for his life. He started a family, and worked on a music career as a writer, producer and performer.

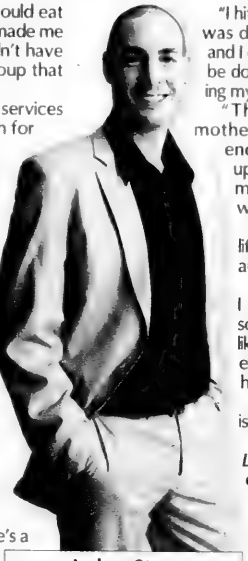
"I was trying to make conscious rap for at-risk kids. There were some gangster rap elements in my music, but there were warnings in all my songs," says Stern, whose stage name is The Truth.

"I would write about my experiences in L.A., and it was therapeutic for me. I was like four Oprah stories wrapped into one – I overcame sexual abuse, crime, drugs and near-death experiences."

Stern's music career came to an abrupt end when his mother died of leukemia shortly before his 30th birthday.

"I wrote my last song as my mom was dying. She was my biggest fan, my biggest supporter, and she was extremely giving. I remember her being bald, in the hospital, suffering from leukemia and stuffing envelopes with my media kit and my headshot to mail out to everyone."

After the death of his mother, Stern said he lost motivation to make music.



Joshua Stern

"I hit a really low-point in my life. I was drinking, on drugs, depressed, and I didn't like my job. I felt I should be doing so much more. I was fighting myself, every day," Stern recalls.

"Then I had a vision of my mother, and she said, 'Enough is enough. You need to smarten up, write your story, put your marriage back together, and work on positivity.'"

Stern says that changed his life and inspired him to write his autobiography.

"Immediately after that vision, I apologized to my wife, got sober, and started to write. I felt like I was a vessel, like someone else was using my body and my head," Stern said.

Within a month, he had finished the first draft.

Stern describes A Mother's Love as a personal account of his life as well as a warning for parents.

"Far too often young kids don't have an opportunity to share their thoughts with their family and be open and honest. By the time the signs are there, and a parent tries to start communicating, it's usually too late."

The book, which is scheduled for released in early 2012, has garnered encouraging responses, Stern says.

"When you find purpose, and you're positive and confident, it's really contagious. If I can come back from the depths of despair, have this dream, and get to where I am, anybody can do it. You just have to want it, and bad."

When he's not writing, Stern works as an advocate for at-risk youth. He hopes to open Marion's Place, a centre where kids can go for programs while they can't be watched by parents or teachers.

"Young people need a lot of attention and a lot of support," he says.

"Many families are struggling nowadays, and can't afford babysitters or extracurriculars for after school. But kids on their own will find mischief and trouble. They're falling through the cracks."

Intern at Israeli 'green' companies

I recently attended IdeaCity, the annual "meeting of the minds" hosted by Moses Znaimer. This year, the concept of "IdeaSex" – the combining of two or more ideas to make another better idea – was the focus.

In his book The Rational Optimist, Matt Ridley writes about the real world implications of IdeaSex, hypothesizing that the rate of cultural and economic progress depends on the rate at which ideas are procreating.

Speaking about Israel's economic progress at the IdeaCity conference, Saul Singer, co-author of the book Start-up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle, made a valiant effort to connect IdeaSex with Israel's transformation from a semi-socialist backwater into a high-tech superpower.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

He talked about Shai Aggasi, the CEO of Better Place, a research and development company focused on electric cars and other means of sustainable transportation. Last year, Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty visited Israel, where he met with Aggasi and saw the economic and sustainability value of electric car charging infrastructure deployment. The idea has manifested itself in Ontario, through the implementation of a Better Place pilot project with PowerStream, which is testing the infrastructure deployment for Ontario.

The story emphasized the need to create opportunities that facilitate IdeaSex and development of green technologies between Israel, a leader in sustainable technologies, and Canada.

It made me think. What if there was a program that could engage Canadian and American students and young professionals by placing them in Israeli startups and NGOs for first-hand experience and an exchange of ideas?

Imagine you are a student in a Canadian university or college. You are pursuing your dreams of tikkun olam by making it more sustainable. As part of fulfilling your degree requirements, you must gain experience in an environmental area – energy conservation, renewable energy or sustainable operations. You know about Israel entrepreneurship in the high-tech and renewable energy sectors. You want to gain experience, but are not ready to make aliyah. You want to be an Israel advocate, bringing positive experiences in Israel back to your campus in Canada.

The Israel Innovation Internship Program creates opportunities for young adults to work at Israeli companies and gain degree-relevant experience at Israeli startups and NGOs. In the environmental, or "green-teach" sector, alone, there are 25 positions available (www.careerisrael.com).

Developed by Canada Israel Experience, a department of UIA Federations Canada, in partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Career Israel, the program creates opportunities for Canadian-Israeli IdeaSex that can benefit sustainable development strategies in Canada and strengthen the image of Israel abroad.

Experiencing Israel through the Israel Innovation Internship Program or a similar initiative creates economic and academic ambassadors for Canada and Israel. By strengthening ties between our homeland and the land-of-our-home, we can connect the next generation of Canadian Jewry to Israel, and their Jewish identity, all while striving to fulfil the fundamental Jewish value of tikkun olam.

Are you up to it?

ISRAELI COUSCOUS W/ SWEET POTATOES

1 pkg. Israeli couscous

3 sweet potatoes (cut into 1" cubes)

oil

¼ c maple syrup

1 onion, diced

½ tsp cinnamon

salt to taste

Prepare Israeli couscous according to package instructions; use vegetable broth for more flavour. (If you use a rice cooker, you'll have perfect couscous).

Cover a baking sheet with parchment paper; place sweet potato cubes onto parchment and coat with oil, then brush with maple syrup. Bake at 375° for 20 min. or until softened. Saute diced onions until carmelized. When couscous is done, allow to cool, then break up so couscous is separated; add sweet potatoes and onion. Season with cinnamon and salt to taste.

If you enjoy reading cookbooks…

By Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

As a self-described cookbookaholic, one thing I look forward to this time of the year is the semi-annual appearance of the new cookbooks. I'm an admitted cookbook addict and have hundreds.

Since I read cookbooks the way some people read novels, I can't wait to get my hands on the latest ones and curl up with a cup of tea and a new cookbook, reading and planning the recipes I'm going to try.

Here are two new books I think are must-haves for anyone who loves to cook.

Persian Food from the Non-Persian Bride, by Reyna Simnegar (Feldheim) is not only a cookbook but also a tale of a young Venezuelan girl whose family dates back to the Spanish Inquisition. Until the age of 12, she didn't know she was Jewish (her family were Anusim (Marranos, or Crypto Jews). Her stories of learning to cook authentic cuisine for her Persian husband in Los Angeles are funny and intriguing, the 110 full-colour photos are gorgeous, and of course, the recipes – you'll want to start at page 1 and try them all! Even the most inexperienced cooks will learn to prepare delicious Persian meals in no time from her step-by-step recipes – dishes like Persian Pomegranate Soup, Veal or Lamb Roast with Dates and Apricots, Chelo with Potato Tadig, and a selection of wonderful Persian stews, snacks and desserts.

The author includes Persian menus for holidays and simchahs, where ingredients can be purchased and substitutions for ingredients that might be difficult to find.

RED RICE WITH ONIONS (Polo Germez)

3 cups basmati rice, checked and rinsed
1 (28-ounce) can crushed tomatoes
3 cups water
½ cup canola oil
1 ½ tbsp. salt
¼ tsp. ground saffron (optional)
1 large onion, chopped into small dice

Fill a 6-quart non-stick saucepan with rice, tomatoes, water, canola oil, salt, saffron and onion. Mix together. Cover and bring to a boil over high heat. Reduce heat to medium/low. Simmer for 10 minutes.

Uncover and place 2 paper towels (one on top of the other) over the rice. The ends will extend outside the pot. Replace the lid tightly. Reduce heat to low and simmer for 30 minutes. Turn off the heat and tilt the lid to allow the steam to escape so that the crunchy bottom does not become soggy.

Serve on a shallow platter, mounding the rice into a pyramid, and garnishing with the tagid (the crunchy, golden crust created by cooking rice Persian-style). Makes 8 servings.

Kosher Elegance, The Art of Cooking with Style, by Efrat Libfroind (Feldheim, May 2011). Each of the 115 recipes (with gorgeous full-colour photos) from this professional chef and mother of six will impress you. This is a cookbook for when you want to "wow!" your family or guests for a special occasion with dishes such as Caramelized Vegetables on a Bed of Sweet Potato Puree, Chicken Breasts Stuffed with Hazelnuts and Cranberries or Pistachio-Coated Cranberry Cream Roulade.

The photo presentations may lead you to think the dishes are too complicated, but Libfroind's recipes are made from simple ingredients and she gives suggestions for serving the dish simply or tips for show-stopping exquisite presentations. The chapter on "Occasions" has recipes for Shabbat, holidays and special events; "Brunch" offers delicious dairy dishes; "Simplicity" contains two-minute recipes that everyone needs at times; and "Temptation" and "Chocolate" are reputation-making desserts.

Shul introduces interfaith burial

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A motion to redevelop a portion of Shaarey Zedek Synagogue's cemetery for interfaith burial was almost unanimously accepted at a recent meeting attended by about 80 congregants.

The congregation made the June 29 decision to accommodate the changing demographics of Jewish life in North America.

"We have to go where the people are," said Ian Staniloff, the Shaarey Zedek's executive director, adding that "up to 70 per cent of young Jewish Winnipeggers are in interfaith marriages."

Staniloff said that the synagogue has for some time been accepting non-Jews as members if they have Jewish spouses who are members. The proviso is that the non-Jewish spouse cannot serve on the board or ritual committee, nor be on the bimah during services.

"We have been considering the issue of joint burial for couples in an interfaith marriage for a couple of years," Staniloff said. "We are not quite at that stage yet where there is much demand, but the big wave is coming."

He added that the interfaith burial decision is intended to accommodate not only Shaarey Zedek members but also the wider Jewish community – as does the cemetery itself.

Shaarey Zedek is Winnipeg's largest congregation and the more than 100-year-old synagogue is the city's oldest. Four years ago, the Conservative shul opened its doors to gay, lesbian and transgendered members, and senior Rabbi Alan Green has expressed a willingness to perform same-sex marriages.

Offer Rescinded

OTTAWA — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler has rescinded his personal invitation to Palestinian Authority (PA) leader Mahmoud Abbas to visit Canada and meet the Jewish community because of the reconciliation accord Fatah-controlled PA signed in May with Hamas – a terrorist group governing Gaza bent on destroying Israel. Cotler made the announcement at the recent President's Conference in Israel. Abbas was originally due to visit Canada by this summer, but the trip was put on hold indefinitely last February because of upheaval in the Arab world.

Negev Dinner

LONDON — Close to 300 people attended the annual Negev Dinner, honouring Anne Marie DeCicco-Best, the former mayor of London. The London Jewish National Fund (JNF) is supporting forest rehabilitation at the Birya Fortress Lookout, near the town of Safed, which was damaged by fires caused by Hezbollah rockets during the 2006 Lebanon war.

WORLD

Most Wanted

DETROIT — A Canadian citizen who once lived in Michigan is accused of planning to travel to Israel to detonate a bomb on behalf of Hezbollah. Faouzi Ayoub, 44, formerly of Dearborn, Mich., was added to the FBI's most wanted list of terrorists last week after a two-year-old indictment against him for passport fraud was unsealed. His whereabouts are unknown. Ayoub, a native of Lebanon, is accused of trying to enter Israel in 2000 on a false passport in order to carry out a bombing attack for Hezbollah. He reportedly was part of an exchange of 436 prisoners released by Israel for businessman Elhanan Tannenbaum and the bodies of three Israeli soldiers.

Petition Calls for Justice

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — A campaign has been launched to bring the masterminds of the AMIA Jewish centre bombing to justice.

The Latin American Jewish Congress launched the petition campaign in commemoration of the 17th anniversary of the July 18, 1994, terrorist attack. The petition is to be delivered to Argentina's president, Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner, on the anniversary of the bombing, which killed 85 and injured more than 300.

"The masterminds of the attack have not been brought to justice yet, but only Iran is to blame since they refuse to co-operate with the Argentine justice," said Claudio Epleman, director of the Latin American Jewish Congress, a regional chapter of the World Jewish Congress.

Meanwhile, Bolivian President Evo Morales apologized for meeting with Iranian Defence Minister Ahmad Vahidi, calling it "a mistake." Morales made the apology in a meeting with Aldo Donzis, head of the DAIA Jewish political umbrella in Argentina.

Argentina has accused Vahidi of planning the attack on the AMIA Jewish centre. The Argentine Justice Department had called on Interpol to detain Vahidi, who has had an international arrest warrant issued against him since 2007.

Bomb plot

NEW YORK — A federal judge who sentenced three men to 25 years in prison for plotting to blow up synagogues in New York City said the government provoked the crime. The men could have faced life in prison following their convictions last October for planting bombs at the Riverdale Jewish Center and the Riverdale Temple and of planning to shoot down U.S. military aircraft using surface-to-air missiles. The men, all Muslim converts, were arrested in May 2009 after being caught in an FBI sting operation. The government "created acts of terrorism out of [the accused's] fantasies of bravado and bigotry, and then made those fantasies come true," said Manhattan U.S. District Court Judge Colleen McMahon.

Changes underway at Toronto federation

Campaign total down about $1 million

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Concurrent with the recent restructuring of the Canadian Jewish community national advocacy structure, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has been undergoing its own changes, partly because of the restructuring, and partly as a result of belt-tightening in the wake of a lower campaign total this past year.

The most recent UJA campaign brought in $63 million, compared to $64 million the previous year. Federation president and CEO Ted Sokolsky told The CJN last week that a decision was made, that, "in order to keep our allocations stable, we'd trim our overhead."

Sokolsky noted that the past few years have been challenging for all philanthropies. "We're very fortunate to hold our own."

The recent decrease is a departure from a growth trend that spanned 12 years when the UJA campaign virtually doubled, from $33.5 million in 1997 to $65 million in 2009, Sokolsky noted.

Over the course of the past year, four or five federation staff members were let go, three or four contract positions ended, and "a couple" of positions were left unfilled after federation employees retired, Sokolsky said.

At UJA Federation, budgetary cutbacks made up for the campaign shortfall, adding up to at least $1 million, Sokolsky said. Allocations to community agencies have been more or less "constant," although some have had cuts of up to five per cent. "There have been some small adjustments up and down."

Ted Sokolsky

In a different type of change, last week two UJA Federation staff members moved to the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy 2.0 (CIJA 2.0) – the working title for the new entity, Sokolsky said. Among them are Howard English, the federation's former vice-president of corporate communications, and Leigh Brown, who worked in public and media relations. English has taken on a senior position, but his title has not been finalized, confirmed Shimon Fogel, CEO of CIJA 2.0. English and others in his position will remain under the umbrella of their local federations.

The new national organization – which has taken over the advocacy roles of the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec Israel Committee, the University Outreach Committee and National Jewish Campus Life – has staff in other Canadian federations as well.

'If I can help, I will'

From the editor's desk...

This is the last of three columns about the Rambam Health Care Campus in Haifa. I spent two eye-opening and exhausting days there this past May walking the halls, observing and interviewing.

Spending two intense days in the halls of any busy hospital (especially one such as Rambam, which leads the way in so many areas of clinical treatment and medical research) earnestly taking notes and engaging with countless expert and lay individuals, would, of course, always be exhausting and eye-opening.

But there is an added element combining pride, respect, wonderment and humility that emerges from a visit to Rambam. I also noted it some weeks ago in relation to my visit to the Meir Medical Centre in Kfar Saba, in central Israel.

And this is why.

The nature of the life-saving work at Rambam profoundly belies the calumnies and character assassination spread so zealously about Israel and its society by the boycotters. Moreover, the men and women work at Rambam ardently, without hesitation or reservation toward their moral and professional obligations even in the face of the loud and louder campaigns against them and their state.

Dr. Mark Eidelman came to Israel, with two small children, from the former Soviet Union. He is the director of the Pediatric Orthopedic Department of the children's hospital. Because of the daring and the success of his work, he is known as the "miracle worker." His main areas of interest in orthopedics are limb lengthening and deformity corrections, clubfoot, pelvic osteotomies and pediatric trauma. He is called upon to correct orthopedic messes.

Some 70 per cent of Eidelman's pediatric cases are Arab children, from the north of Israel, the West Bank, Gaza and even outside Israel.

"We do whatever we can to treat all patients properly. I do not differentiate between patients," Eidelman told The CJN. Then, with a sad sigh of resignation, he added "But I have no dreams about peace."

Dr. Shlomi Israelit is the director, emergency trauma department. He speaks with a low-key urgency in his voice, no doubt the result of working in conditions of unremitting, unending constant pressure at the hospital and as an airborne doctor in the Israel Defence Forces on missions of high-risk rescue.

He told The CJN that Rambam's emergency department treats about 300 patients a day. About half of them are moderately to severely injured. And they do about 15 resuscitations daily, that is, they "bring back to life" about 15 people each day. One-third of the physicians on his staff are Arabs; another third are former Russians; another third are, what Israelit calls "old-timers."

These days, Israelit stated with considerable relief, the trauma he and his staff treat is "civilian" trauma. In Israel, however, emergency medical trauma often arrives through terror and war. When it does, his department is the first line of the medical trenches in the north.

"We have also saved the lives of terrorists," Israelit said. "I don't regret that. My role is saving lives."

Helping save lives in a non-medical way, has essentially been the life's work of Hulda Gurevich. The remarkable 84-year-old is known at the hospital as "the angel in white." This past Yom Ha'atzmaut she received the Israel Prize. Ever since the difficult days of the Yom Kippur War in October 1973, the tall, stately woman, clad always in dazzling white, has been a daily fixture at the hospital tending to the morale of patients and even of weary professionals.

Gurevich speaks very emphatically, waving her large hands to underscore the gravity of her words even as she holds the listener in the grip of her emotion and with her piercing azure eyes. "If I can help, I will," she told The CJN, referring to the plight of anyone in need. "All my life, I have volunteered in whatever way I could. It was a tradition in our home, an example I saw from my grandparents," Gurevich elaborated.

Hulda Gurevich

As we spoke, a woman interrupted us to hug Gurevich and convey her congratulations to her for receiving the Israel Prize the week before.

"Rambam can be an example for the whole world," Gurevich said, finding just the right words to sum up my feelings about the hospital. "Jews, Muslims, Christians, Druze even Armenians who were mistreated by the Turks. Everyone receives support here," the angel in white said.

True again, I thought, to the teachings of the Rambam: "May I never see in the patient anything but a fellow creature in pain."

Antisemitism rising in Canada, parliamentary inquiry says

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The final report of the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Antisemitism (CPCCA) states Canada is turning into a hotbed of antisemitic activity, especially on university campuses.

The coalition released the report on July 7 after nearly two years of hearings on the subject, and is calling on the government to do more to fight the spread of antisemitism in the country.

In February 2009, 125 parliamentarians from more than 40 countries gathered in London for the inaugural conference of the Inter-parliamentary Committee for Combating Antisemitism (ICCA).

The Canadian coalition is associated with this committee, and was formed in March 2009 in the aftermath of the London conference.

That conference produced The London Declaration for Combating Antisemitism, which required conference participants to return to their respective legislatures and establish inquiries into the "existing nature and state of antisemitism in their countries and developing recommendations for government and civil society action."

The CPCCA inquiry panel was led by former Liberal MP for Davenport, Mario Silva, and Conservative MP for Lanark-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington, Scott Reid. The coalition is also led by Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney and its international steering committee chair, Irwin Cotler, Liberal MP for Mont Royal.

JDL turns tables on anti-Israel crowd

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

An anti-Israel lecture at the University of Toronto was disrupted last week when Jewish Defense League national director Meir Weinstein got into a shouting match with a Palestinian speaker and members of the audience.

Weinstein said 10 minutes into a lecture by Omar Barghouti, one of the founders of the BDS (boycott, divestment and sanctions) movement and an advocate for the academic boycott of Israel, he rose to confront the speaker's "lies."

Barghouti, who studies at Tel Aviv University, was criticizing Israel for "apartheid" and calling for its isolation, Weinstein said.

"The bottom line of what he wants is, no Jewish state... He was going on how it's important to boycott Israel and how Israel has to be isolated as much as possible, that even though he was born in Qatar, it's his land."

After a few minutes of cross-shouting, captured on tape and posted on the Internet, Weinstein and several JDL members were ushered out of the lecture hall at the Sandford Fleming Building by campus security.

Weinstein said that while he attended the lecture hoping to pose questions to the speaker, he's pleased with the outcome.

"I've seen how these guys interrupt Israeli speakers and they're proud of that. I thought a taste of their own medicine would be OK."

Weinstein added, "We're looking to embolden the Jewish community here and other Jewish communities and cities to not take a back seat anymore."

Isn't he worried such tactics could escalate?

"It's already happening on campuses versus pro-Israeli speakers. It's been going on for years and it's about time they get a taste of their own medicine. Is it something we like to do or relish? No. We wish we didn't have to protest."

Barghouti's lecture was organized by the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid; Ontario Public Interest Research Group (U of T); Students Against Israeli Apartheid (Toronto); Faculty4Palestine; Palestine House Educational and Cultural Centre; and the Canadian Arab Federation.

Muslim prayers in school spark controversy

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

An accommodation policy that permits Muslim prayers in a school cafeteria during class hours likely violates Canadian law that prohibits religious prayers in schools, said law professor Ed Morgan.

"Facts are everything" when it comes to determining whether the practice complies with case law, Morgan said.

But based on media reports it appears a Toronto District School Board (TDSB) school is helping organize the prayer session and lending its imprimatur to religious services.

"That sounds to me to run afoul of the Charter of Rights," he said.

Ed Morgan

Last week, Canadian Hindu Advocacy (CHA) raised concerns over prayer in Valley Park Middle School in Flemingdon Park.

"We've been hearing complaints for a few months from parents and students," said CHA director Ron Banerjee.

The parents and students approached the CHA because "they felt the TDSB and the school were so pro-Islamist that they'd suffer consequences if they brought it up," Banerjee said.

"They don't feel it's appropriate for the cafeteria to be taken over during class hours by any group."

Parents and students feel it disrupts classes as many students leave to attend the prayers and when they return, they have to be brought up to speed on the material they missed, he said, adding, "How do you know what's being taught?"

Morgan said that in cases dating back to the mid-1980s, Canadian courts have ruled that school prayers, even with an opt-out provision, violate charter guarantees of freedom of religion.

It was determined that such a policy could potentially create strong social pressure to participate and could stigmatize children who aren't interested.

In the current case, "the school is intimately involved in the organization of it. It looks like the school gives its imprimatur," Morgan said.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) long opposed the practice of permitting prayers in public schools.

Farewell Lebanon

So hysterical and widely saturating has been the media coverage of the second Gaza flotilla and the "alternative" Ben-Gurion Airport flotilla that the effective dissolution of a clerically balanced Lebanon has gone unnoticed and unmourned.

Last week, Prime Minister Najib Mikati won parliamentary support for his proposed government. Mikati has the full backing of Hezbollah. In light of the fact that Hezbollah, the radical Shia rulers, are merely glorified satraps of their funders, backers and armourers in Tehran and close allies of Syrian dictator Bashar al-Assad, Mikati's parliamentary victory is, in truth, a legal ligature tying Lebanon for the present and foreseeable future to the outstretched tentacles of Iran.

The vote in the Lebanese parliament came less than a week after a UN tribunal issued its final report into the murder of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, in 2005.

The tribunal issued warrants for the arrest of four members of Hezbollah and made clear the link to the murder of the current Syrian regime. Hassan Nasrallah, the head of the radical Lebanese Shia group, immediately condemned the report. Indeed, he had condemned the work of the tribunal long before it arrived at any conclusions, calling it "a U.S.-Israeli plot which is targeting Hezbollah and Syria."

Nasrallah vowed he would never hand over the individuals named by the criminal investigation and will not hand over any of the suspects.

Hariri was a popular, western-oriented leader of Lebanon. His son, Saad, also a former prime minister of the country, left the legislative chamber before the voting began last week to protest the effective takeover of his country by extremist Shia Islamists. He saw the futility of the vote.

It was a theatrical trick staged by Hezbollah to lend the Mikati government the cloak of parliamentary legitimacy in which it will constantly and self-servingly wrap itself against the cold and howling winds from those who yet remember what Lebanon once was and who will lament what the western world and the Middle East have lost.

Mikati promised his government would co-operate with the United Nation's investigators trying to bring the Hariri murderers to justice. But, as Nasrallah himself said, that simply won't happen.

According to Middle East analyst Barry Rubin, Hezbollah controls 70 per cent of the government's ministries.

A moderate, western-oriented government is now impossible. Worse. A moderate, western-oriented Lebanon is now impossible. Farewell to the Lebanon that was the dream of the Lebanese who saw Beirut as the Paris of the Middle East.

Welcome, alas, to the new Lebanon that is the dream of the Iranians who see Beirut as a bridge on the march to Jerusalem.

Flotilla lawsuit misconceived

In my view, Cherna Rosenberg's lawsuit to use Canadian law to enjoin Canadian groups from participating in the International Freedom Flotilla to Gaza is misconceived and may do more harm than good ("Lawsuit aimed at stopping Canadian boat in Gaza flotilla," June 16). I say this for the following reasons. First, it is safe to predict that the litigation will drag on for years (unless it is abandoned in the meantime), while the defendants question Rosenberg's eligibility to bring the action and the constitutional validity of the Canadian law in so far as it prevents Canadians from providing humanitarian aid to the civilian population in Gaza. A second reason is that it'll provide more ammunition for both pro-Israeli and pro-Arab groups to use Canada as a battleground for their ideological warfare, greatly, I suspect, to the distaste of many Canadians.

My third reason is that the lawsuit is more likely to alienate public opinion than to rally it in support of Israel's position. I have close and very well informed non-Jewish friends in Toronto who are critical of Israeli policies in the West Bank and who strongly believe that Israel is as much a sinner as being sinned against. They will see this litigation as another (albeit covert) attempt by the Israeli government to influence international opinion in its favour. I have little doubt many other Canadians will share their skepticism.

Finally and not least, I see the lawsuit as distracting attention from what should be every concerned Canadian's position: to help promote a fair and lasting settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict, a conflict that has poisoned international relations for the past 64 years and more. In my view, the Canadian government could play its most constructive role by encouraging ongoing dialogue between the Muslim and Jewish communities in our own backyard. Up to now, and most regrettably, they have largely seen each other as two solitudes perpetuating the biases and prejudices so common between Arabs and Israelis in the Middle East.

Church's boycott call

In the article "United Church wing calls for boycott" (June 23), I do not understand why a Toronto presbytery of the United Church of Canada is calling on its members to boycott six Canadian and Israeli companies because of their activities in the West Bank, but does not involve itself with the atrocities of Libya, and Syria. Why not boycott Lebanon as well for not allowing Palestinians to become citizens of that country? Why not boycott Gaza for firing rockets into the State of Israel?

'Israeli apartheid' not antisemitism

There are good reasons to be suspicious of the term "Israeli apartheid." That it is antisemitic is not among them. Antisemitism is hatred of or bias toward Jews as Jews – it's less about what we do, than it is about who we are. That's what makes it so terrible. The charge that Israel is an apartheid state is a charge about Israeli policy, about what the Israeli government does, not about the Jewish people as such (or even about what Jews as a group do). Misusing the charge of antisemitism isn't good for anybody: it mischaracterizes many critics of Israeli policy, which is bad for healthy debate, and it weakens the ability to combat true antisemitism.

The 'piece' Palestinians want

As a Jewish-British-Canadian who loves Israel dearly, I cannot agree with letter writer Avraham Zer-Aviv ("Endorse a Palestinian state," June 16). Jordan is a Palestinian state in the area designated by the League of Nations on Sept. 16, 1922. At the same time, the League of Nations designated as Jewish Palestine the area from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean. Israel has full legal rights to build in this area, and if anyone is exercising illegal occupation, it is the Palestinians, these same Palestinians who do not want to recognize Israel as a Jewish state. They say they want peace – the only "peace" they want is the "piece" that is Israel.

Lessons of Gaza departure resonate six years later

Linda Gradstein
JTA

Yisrael Medad remembers when just eight families lived in the red-roofed homes in the Jewish settlement of Shiloh deep in the hills of the West Bank.

Now some 2,500 Israelis live here, and Shiloh has playgrounds, schools and a yeshiva. The red-roofed homes sprawl over several hills, and new homes continue to be built. At the bottom of the hill is the archeological excavation of the biblical Shiloh, where the Tabernacle is believed to have been built.

Shiloh is often cited as one of the settlements likely to be uprooted under any final peace deal with the Palestinians. It is relatively isolated, about 28 miles north of Jerusalem, halfway between the Palestinian cities of Ramallah and Nablus.

But with little movement in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, Shiloh is not likely to disappear anytime soon. And even in the long term, any discussion of dismantling Jewish settlements in the West Bank is haunted by Israel's experience six years ago this summer, when the removal of some 9,000 settlers from their homes in the Gaza Strip was followed by a Hamas takeover of Gaza and rocket attacks against Israel.

"The expulsion from Gaza should serve as a warning for any withdrawal from Judea and Samaria," said Hamutal Cohen of the Committee for the Residents of Gush Katif, which was the largest bloc of Jewish settlements in Gaza. "The government totally failed with 9,000 settlers. How can they manage with tens of thousands?"

Only 20 per cent of the 1,700 families forced to leave Gaza have moved into permanent homes, according to the committee. Many, especially farmers, have not been able to find work.

"You can't fix the trauma and crisis these people are still suffering six years later," Danny Danon, a Knesset member from the Likud party, told JTA. "Marriages have broken up and a lot of kids dropped out of school. People still live like refugees."

There is great debate in Israel over whether the withdrawal from Gaza, which then-prime minister Ariel Sharon carried out in August 2005, was a strategic failure or success.

On the one hand, Israel no longer had to deal with the daily security threats and headache of protecting 9,000 Jews in Gaza. And on the diplomatic front, Israel's withdrawal ended Israel's formal occupation of the coastal strip, which it had captured from Egypt in 1967 but never incorporated into Israel proper.

On the other hand, a year after the Israeli withdrawal, Hamas seized control of Gaza, and rocket fire from Gaza into southern Israel increased dramatically. At the end of 2008, Israel launched a three-week war to stem the rocket fire, drawing international condemnation for its military actions. Over the last few years, Palestinian advocates have also argued that Israel's blockade of Gaza, which has loosened recently, constituted a de facto continuation of the occupation.

Danon says the Gaza withdrawal was clearly a mistake and a West Bank pullback would be an even bigger mistake. Citing the rocket threat, he noted that an Israeli withdrawal even from part of the West Bank would leave central Israel – including Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Ben-Gurion Airport – well within Palestinian rocket range.

"People in Israel were willing to pay a heavy price in exchange for a real peace, but now they feel betrayed," Danon said. "They feel like it was all for nothing."

Then there's the military challenge inherent in any West Bank withdrawal. During the pullout from Gaza, many in Israel speculated that pro-settler soldiers and officers would disobey orders to evacuate the Gaza settlers. That did not happen and most soldiers did their jobs. The few who, in good conscience, felt they could not perform this duty were quietly excused.

But a withdrawal from the West Bank could be different. For one thing, the number of settlers whose communities would not be annexed to Israel could exceed 80,000 (an estimated 320,000 Jews are living in West Bank settlements, not including eastern Jerusalem, which Israel annexed).

Yossi Klein Halevi, a journalist and a fellow at Jerusalem's Shalom Hartman Institute, says support for Jewish settlers in the West Bank has gone mainstream in a way that support for settlements in Gaza never did.

"Two generations have grown up in Israel who see the settlements not only as part of Israel but as the heart of Israel," Halevi told JTA. "Any withdrawal from the West Bank would involve mass refusal of soldiers to follow orders, and I am deeply worried about the ability of the army to continue to be an effective fighting force."

Halevi estimates that Jewish settlers and their supporters make up 40 per cent of some combat units; an Israeli army spokesperson said the Israel Defence Forces does not release figures "on such a sensitive subject." Orthodox men, who constitute a wellspring of support for the settlements, continue to volunteer for combat units in large numbers.

These Orthodox youths also are fiercely loyal to their rabbis. When Israeli police recently detained Rabbi Dov Lior of the Jewish settlement of Kiryat Arba to question him on charges of incitement and racism, hundreds of Orthodox youths in Jerusalem blocked streets and clashed with police. If Rabbi Lior issued a ruling that it is forbidden to force Jews to leave Jewish settlements in the West Bank, many Orthodox Jewish soldiers might find themselves torn.

Gershon Baskin of the Israel Palestine Center for Research and Information says such fears are overstated and that most religious soldiers would follow the orders of the army, not their rabbis.

"Israel is a state where the rule of law works," Baskin told JTA. "If there's a democratic decision which is seen as legitimate, supported by Knesset and perhaps backed by a referendum, the public will not be behind any settlers who will take the law into their own hands and use violence.

"It will be much more traumatic than the Gaza withdrawal. But if people are convinced that peace is going to be real and settlement withdrawal would be gradual and incremental over time," they would support it, he said.

It's not clear whether Jews who live in settlements like Shiloh would have the option of staying on under Palestinian sovereignty or whether they would want to remain. Some Palestinian officials, including Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, have welcomed the idea, but PA President Mahmoud Abbas has expressed reservations.

"If a Palestinian state is created and my security could be ensured, I would definitely choose to stay," said Medad, who has lived in Shiloh since 1981.

Rabbi Hartman offers a 'theology of response'

Although he moved from Montreal to Jerusalem in 1971, Rabbi David Hartman still inspires many Canadians with his warmth, his passion and his brilliance. Similarly, as his new book makes clear, his experiences as a Montreal rabbi continue to shape him, too. In The God Who Hates Lies: Confronting & Rethinking Jewish Tradition, Hartman continues struggling with some of the dilemmas congregants shared with him. His response has triggered his bold approach to Halachah, Jewish law, as he seeks to "embrace a tradition that embraces a God who embraces life."

Gil Troy

A courageous thinker, Rabbi Hartman runs toward the very conflicts others flee. Struggling with the agunah question, the purgatory a woman suffers when her husband does not give her a signed divorce decree, he recalls one "major modern Orthodox halachic authority" who told him: "This is my personal Akedah," comparing his frustration over this archaic rule with the test of faith God imposed on Abraham by binding Isaac for sacrifice. "Your Akedah," Rabbi Hartman snapped. "Is that supposed to bring comfort to the abandoned woman whose life is passing her by?" Rabbi Hartman recoils from "this theological posturing, with its distasteful rhetoric of rabbinic helplessness and suffering."

As a young rabbi, Rabbi Hartman was so busy encouraging his congregants to observe the commandments he overlooked what he calls "many of Halachah's darker moral trends." He tells the story of Peter, a 45-year-old single congregant who fell in love with Susan. Although both were serious Jews, Peter as a Kohen – a priest – was forbidden from marrying Susan, a convert. This reading of Jewish virtue when it comes to conversions, along with, as he puts it, "the systemic moral challenge of feminism," propelled Rabbi Hartman into a "meta-halachic" search, trying to understand the central principle underlying Jewish law.

Rabbi Hartman regretfully rejects the "theology of halachic permanence" articulated by his beloved teacher, Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik. In a powerful chapter asking Where Did Modern Orthodoxy Go Wrong?, Rabbi Hartman critiques Rabbi Soloveitchik's approach, which freezes Jewish law "permanently and uniformly in place," ignoring "the passing of time" and "the shifting of culture." Hartman finds the approach "deeply inhuman," saying, "I must part company with a view of Halachah that takes it out of history and out of human experience.... I do not think that loyalty to and love for this tradition requires exiting history or exiting life."

Instead, Rabbi Hartman offers what he calls a "theology of response" based on the talmudic teaching not to "ascribe false things to God." The "God who hates lies" wants us to respond to our experiences, to our moral sensibilities, as they develop, to "incorporate" them "into our spiritual and ritual lives." Accepting the premise that "reality speaks," Rabbi Hartman identifies an authentic, historically rooted, Jewish theology that allows Peter to marry Susan because "identity drawn from choice and behaviour" trumps "identify as a biological gift of the God of Israel."

This morally driven theology will honour as a Jew the Russian-born Israeli soldier who dies fighting for the Jewish people, even if he may have some non-Jewish blood. This person-centred approach is open to honouring women as equal human beings having been "created in the image of God." And this sensitivity to history reframes the discussion about religion in the sovereign State of Israel by welcoming new moral horizons, as well as a deeper understanding of peoplehood, loyalty, and identity with a Halachah conceived in Jewish powerlessness now applied and adapted to the new reality of Jews having power.

Critics will rush to caricature Rabbi Hartman's argument as yet another reformer's appeal. But serious readers of this book will realize that such a dismissal is too facile. This book is "God-intoxicated" – Rabbi Hartman's phrase – and text-intoxicated, steeped in a passionate, erudite, creative yet reverential engagement with Jewish tradition. Rabbi Hartman is simply too learned to be ignored so easily. He knows his Maimonides and his Talmud, his Tanach and his Tosefos, rooting his humanistic halachic vision in a lively, learned, traditional reading of the sources.

In the 40 years since he left Montreal, Rabbi Hartman has been a revolutionary, doing good in Jerusalem and throughout the Jewish world. This prophet of pluralism, this philosopher who rejects falsehood, this rabbi of reason and reach has now posed a serious challenge to his Orthodox colleagues. It is incumbent upon them to read, respond – and maybe even reformulate, if not reform.

Hug a tree!

Rebbe Nachman of Bratslav, one of the most famous chassidic thinkers of the 19th century, composed a beautiful prayer in which he lauds nature as the scene of true spirituality.

He writes, "Master of the Universe, grant me the ability to be alone. May it be my custom to go outdoors each day among the trees and grasses, among all growing things, there to be alone and enter into prayer. There, may I express all that is in my heart, talking with The One to whom I belong. And may all grasses, trees and plants awake at my coming. Send the power of their life into my prayer, making whole my heart and my speech through the life and spirit of growing things, made whole by their transcendent Source. Oh! That they would enter my prayer! Then would I fully open my heart in prayer, supplication and holy speech; then, O Holy One, would I pour out the words of my heart before Your Presence."

The idea of finding spirituality in nature is not a new one, but it is a very popular one today. Ask a typical Jew where he or she feels more spiritual, and the answer will somehow be outdoors: at a sunset, on a mountaintop, at the ocean. But I'm not sure if they find spirituality in how the outdoors makes them feel (thus the spirituality is inner-directed) or in the power and majesty of nature itself (thus the spirituality is outward-directed.)

Do we ever truly feel the "life and spirit of growing things"? Do we ever summon "the power of their life" into our prayers? Do we feel the grasses, trees and plants awake at our coming? Not if we are afraid to be called that derogatory and dismissive name of "tree hugger."

But to be perfectly honest, walking in a redwood forest with the sunlight streaming through the canopies, or hiking a rainforest with 1,000-year-old growth, or standing beside a gnarled and beautifully smooth old trunk of a tree growing out of a barren cliff, how could I not hug it? How cold on the inside would I have to be to walk past it and not see its life and spirit?

Last month, I visited Boston, the house where my now-oldest son lived until the age of two. We went to see the tree we had planted the week of his birth, in a then-barren front yard. Now, 21 years later, he stood tall next to a tall tree. I hugged him. I hugged the tree. I felt the tree awake at our coming.

Midrash Rabbah (Genesis 10:6) says that every blade of grass has its own angel that bends over it and whispers, "Grow, grow." I have been in places so beautiful that I can hear the angel whisper to the grass. But only if I open my ears, unstop the city noise, and pause my own fear-of-being-too-touchy-feely button.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

We in Canada often find it difficult to feel the power of nature as a spiritual source because the city is not the forest, the apartment building is not the log cabin. We have so many months of cold and snow that unless we ski, it's hard to imagine the angel of slush.

But once the weather gets nice, as summer approaches, we need look no further than the trees in our backyards, the lake in Muskoka, the sound of the loons, the flowers as we garden, the azure sky and the summer thunderstorm, to be awed by the magnificence of nature. We need to take it just one step further, and we will discover the hidden power of spirituality: the ability and the desire to express gratitude, our own smallness, and awe in the face of beauty and natural majesty. To say a simple and silent blessing of thanks, to acknowledge out loud the life and spirit of all growing things.

Jewish tradition regards nature as sacred, and we are humans and partners in maintaining its beauty. So, even the way we go to the beach, the food we eat at the CNE, the trips to the neighbourhood park can all be seen as Jewish experiences if we place them in the context of thoughtful spiritual awareness. If we stop to hear the angel whisper to the grass and if we spend a moment alone, as Rebbe Nachman did each day, to express all that is in our hearts to the elegant and graceful world around us.

A cornucopia of books...

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The days are longer and the sun is warmer. Summer is finally here, ushering in a new reading season.

Nearly 120 years ago, a young Jewish officer in the French army, Alfred Dreyfus, was wrongfully convicted of spying for Germany and packed off to purgatory on Devil's Island. The Dreyfus affair polarized France and changed it forever.

In Dreyfus: Politics, Emotion, and the Scandal of the Century (Metropolitan Books), Ruth Harris, an Oxford University historian, skillfully analyzes the social forces that caused and shaped this seminal event. Harris, a keen observer and fluent writer, delves into primary documents - letters and diaries from both sides - and delivers a splendid account of an injustice that shook a nation to its foundations.

When the German army swept unopposed into Paris on June 14, 1940, France lay prostrate. Within a week, France officially surrendered, but life in the City of Light proceeded as normal, except, of course, for its Jewish residents. Theatres, movie houses, cabarets and art galleries reopened, and for the next four years of the Nazi occupation, the arts flourished. Alan Riding, a former New York Times correspondent in Paris, describes this strange period with flair in a bracing book, And the Show Went On: Cultural Life in Nazi-Occupied Paris (Alfred A. Knopf).

Russian-born novelist Irene Nemirovsky, the author of David Golder and Suite Francaise, was an acclaimed literary figure in France when the Germans rolled in. She and her family fled to the countryside, but were caught and deported to Auschwitz. Drawing on her diaries, interviews and untapped archival material, co-authors Olivier Philipponnat and Patrick Lienhardt piece together her brief but lustrous career in The Life of Irene Nemirovsky (Alfred A. Knopf).

What was it like growing up in Nazi Germany? Frederic Tubach, an American who spent his formative years in the country, supplies the answers in a fine volume, German Voices: Memories of Life During Hitler's Third Reich (University of California Press). Tubach, in part, draws on 80,000 unpublished letters written by German civilians and soldiers during the war.

Harvard University Press has published the paperback edition of Gordon Horowitz's excellent Ghettostadt: Lodz and the Making of a Nazi City. Horowitz juxtaposes the misery of the sealed ghetto with the cleanliness and orderliness of the rest of the town.

The dangers and perils Hungarian Jews faced in Budapest following the German occupation in 1944 are well-known. Zsuzsanna Ozsvath, a survivor, viscerally recreates this dark era in When the Danube Ran Red (Syracuse University Press).

With ignominious defeat in sight, the Nazis escalated their brutal treatment of inmates in concentration camps by forcing them on death marches. By all accounts, 250,000 inmates perished, murdered by SS guards, army and police units and armed gangs. Daniel Blatman's The Death Marches: The Final Phase of Nazi Genocide (Harvard University Press) is exceedingly thorough and heartbreaking.

Inspired by racism and traditional Christian antisemitism, pro-Nazi German Protestant theologians redefined Jesus as an Aryan and Christianity as a religion at odds with Judaism. They propagated their noxious view through the Institute for the Study and Eradication of Jewish Influence on German Religious Life. Susannah Heschel, in The Aryan Jesus: Christian Theologians and the Bible in Nazi Germany (Princeton University Press), deftly examines this Nazified form of Christianity and its effect on believers.

Nazis on the Run: Hitler's Henchmen Fled Justice (Oxford University Press), by Gerald Steinacher, retells a morally disturbing story. After the war, thousands of Nazi criminals evaded arrest and imprisonment by fleeing Europe, all too often with the connivance and assistance of the Red Cross and the Vatican and the indifference of the victorious Allies. Steinacher believes they succeeded in escaping their fate because the concepts of moral guilt and responsibility had yet to be refined to our contemporary standards.

Adolf Eichmann, the Nazi officer charged with deporting the Jews of Hungary, was captured by the Mossad in Buenos Aires and flown to Israel to face the music. The Eichmann Trial (Schocken), by Deborah Lipstadt, is a comprehensive account of a show trial that transfixed the world and altered Israeli perceptions of the Holocaust.

Alvin Rosenfeld claims in his provocative work, The End of the Holocaust (Indiana University Press), that the proliferation of books, films, TV programs and public commemorations have perversely diluted and minimized the true meaning of the Holocaust. He cites examples, from the 1985 visit of Ronald Reagan to the Bitburg cemetery in Germany to the distortions revolving around Anne Frank's martyrdom.

Cathie Carmichael's Genocide Before the Holocaust (Yale University Press) should be required reading. Long before Hitler unleashed his evil fury on unsuspecting Jewish communities in Europe, a succession of minority groups that had lived in harmony with their neighbours suddenly found their lives upturned after the breakup of the Hapsburg, Ottoman and Romanov empires. As she puts it, "The modernization of Europe was accompanied by enormous suffering and dislocation."

Osama bin Laden is dead, having been killed in Pakistan by American commandos in a daring raid on his compound two months ago. Nonetheless, Michael Scheuer's Osama bin Laden (Oxford University Press) makes for interesting reading. A former U.S. spymaster who headed the CIA unit assigned to track him down, he has written a first-rate biography of a man he describes as a remarkable leader and a strategic genius.

Israel has had to shed blood to maintain its existence as a Jewish state. Daniel Byman's A High Price: The Triumphs & Failures of Israeli Counterterrorism (Oxford University Press) is a probing and exacting examination of Israel's policies in combating terrorism since its declaration of statehood in 1948.

Menachem Begin and Anwar Sadat, the prime minister of Israel and the president of Egypt, were locked into a relationship of mutual dependence after Sadat's historic visit to Israel in 1977. Peace in the Making (Gefen), edited by Harry Hurwitz and Yisrael Medad, gives readers a bird's eye view of the issues they had to contend with after Egypt's decision to forge a rapprochement with Israel. Through the letters they exchanged, we better understand what animated them in their search for peace.

Harry Houdini, born Erik Weisz in Hungary, was the consummate showman, a magician who wowed awed audiences. Houdini: Art and Magic (Yale University Press), with an introduction by Brooke Kamin Rapaport, unspools his amazing life through the medium of thoughtful essays.

Albert Einstein, though engrossed in the cosmic mysteries of science, had a way with words. The Ultimate Quotable Einstein (Princeton University Press), collected and edited by Alice Calaprice, reveals his verbal talents in 1,600 quotations on topics from family and aging to prejudice and Zionism. Einstein Before Israel: Zionist Icon or Iconoclast (Princeton University Press), by Ze'ev Rosenkranz, ably traces his involvement in the Zionist movement.

New Na'amat director following her heart

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Lori Nusbaum, senior fundraising and development officer of Na'amat Canada Toronto, is following her heart.

In her position for about three months, Nusbaum, 53, the mother of three grown children, said that until now she has worked in the corporate world, "but my heart has always been in the not-for-profit sector."

She has particularly been interested in the Jewish community, she said, since her visit to Israel on her 50th birthday.

"I wasn't thinking of Na'amat then, but Israel [captured] my heart."

When this opportunity arose, she said, she knew the timing was perfect.

"A lot of what we do is [is involved with] raising money to help women and children, and I have always been an advocate for children. I advocated for my daughter who has a learning disability, and as I got her the help she needed, friends of friends called because they needed help

"A passion of mine is speaking for those who can't speak for themselves, and I've been gifted with a mouth."

Since Na'amat, formerly Pioneer Women, was formed in Canada 86 years ago, she said, it has been dedicated to helping women and children in crisis. "Na'amat supports 260 daycares in Israel, as well as women's shelters."

Na'amat Canada's major project is raising money for the Na'amat Canada Glickman Centre for Family Violence Prevention, in Tel Aviv, a safe haven for victims of domestic abuse, said Nusbaum. "We're raising money to redo the bedrooms, and improve the playground."

When she speaks to people from Israel, she said, everyone has a connection to Na'amat. "Either they were in one of our daycares or are close to someone who was."

Her organization has been fortunate that younger members are still forming chapters, she said. "We have about 400 members ranging in age from 20 to 90. There are several groups of women in their 20s and 30s, and they're more than willing to help out.

Lori Nusbaum

"Mostly they're involved in fundraising, because that is what we do best. They provided about 1,500 backpacks for the kids in the shelters and toiletries for the women."

Many members have mothers and grandmothers in Na'amat, she said, "and they want to continue on the tradition. We're more than happy to have them."

The CJN will BE CLOSED the week of July 11.

Yefet's Canadian and 100 per cent Israeli

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

Gila Yefet is one of the most well-known and appreciated people in the Israeli community in Canada.

Most Israelis will recognize her name from the TV program Together with Gila Yefet, which is aired Sundays on the Ethnic Channels Group's Israeli channel on Rogers Cable. The show is conducted in both Hebrew and English.

Yefet came to Canada at age 12, then proceeded to build her life and establish a family. Yet she defines herself as 100 per cent Israeli.

When I met Yefet for our interview, I was received with a wide smile and a desire to talk and send a message to the Israeli and Jewish communities of Canada.

"Let's begin with my identity," Yefet said. "Indeed, I arrived in Canada at a young age and I've lived here ever since. The atmosphere at home preserved my Israeli identity. My parents put emphasis on the Hebrew language, Israeli culture and important dates in our history. Despite our distance from Israel, we were exposed to all that Israel represents. My parents' home was filled with Israeli presence, and so is my home and the atmosphere I raise my children in."

Regarding how Israel finds expression in her life and home, Yefet said: "We preserve the Jewish tradition, we travel to Israel... and expose Israel to our children. We speak Hebrew at home. We follow the news, pay attention to the important events happening in Israel and experience Israel in our way.

"In addition, we eat Israeli food. The paintings on the wall are landscapes of Jerusalem, Tiberias and Haifa. In some way, we built within our walls our private Israel, like in greenhouse conditions."

"What about Canada?" I asked.

"Canada is my second home. I love it, [have lived] in it most of my life, and my children were born here," she replied. "It is an amazing country, but as a Jew I say that Israel is the home of the Jewish People. We do not have another land. History teaches us that we must keep Israel strong and flourishing [so] that [it] will always be there for us."

Yefet is deeply involved with the Israeli and Jewish communities and is active in the One Family Fund, a non-profit association that supports terror victims.

"Every summer we host a few children at our home that are sent by One Family Fund to a summer camp in Canada. We open our doors. It makes them feel good, and we are satisfied with the ability and the right to give of ourselves," she said.

Gila Yefet

About her TV program, Yefet said that its purpose is to "provide the Israeli community with practical information, talk about the Israeli life, build solidarity and become a part of a community that lives and breathes here for years."

But Yefet is not just a media person, she's also an artist. Recently, she started painting and joined the Israeli Artists Group of Greater Toronto.

Some of her works were presented in an exhibition in Toronto. "For years, I have given of myself to others, and now it is time to give a bit to myself," Yefet said. "The will to paint was always in there, and now it is time to turn that will into reality. Through painting I feel connected to myself. It's a pleasure, calming, and I am happy when I paint."

Yefet said the Israeli community here needs to be "strong, organized" and "united."

"It all depends on each one of us, and things must start at home..." she said. "Only education and values will make our children keep our ways. I believe that my children have the tools to keep their identity and pass it forward."

And to the Canadian Jewish community, Yefet said: "We are one nation, and we don't have the luxury to be divided. We must find a wider common basis which is beyond the basic identity, in order to create mutual communal life."

Funding for Pride in question

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Toronto Pride Week 2011 went off with nary an anti-Israel problem – almost, Jewish community representatives say.

For the many pro-Israel Jewish gay and lesbian community members and their supporters, this year's parade was more festive than those of the last few years, mainly because it was not attended by controversial group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA).

QuAIA made good on its promise to city hall and Pride Toronto's executive not to march in or crash this year's parade, to guarantee that Pride would receive city funding of a nearly $130,000 grant plus close to $250,000 of in-kind funds for security and cleanup services.

Pride organizers had also agreed to remove any QuAIA interlopers from the parade this year.

City council had warned Pride Toronto that this year it would provide funding only after it was determined that QuAIA had not marched in the parade.

While the group did not march, its anti-Israel message was on prominent display on Sunday, July 4, the day of the parade, when members of QuAIA unfurled a 40-foot banner off the Wellesley subway station that read: "Support Palestinian queers – boycott Israeli tourism."

In a separate incident the day before, at Pride's Dyke March, a group calling itself Dykes and Trans People for Palestine was spotted carrying signs reading "Israeli apartheid."

Toronto Coun. Giorgio Mammoliti caught the signs on film and has since stated he believes city funding should be withheld from Pride organizers because of the group's activities and he will ask Mayor Rob Ford his opinion.

Calls by the paper to the mayor's office were not returned by deadline.

Despite these actions, Jewish community leaders and a prominent Jewish city councillor felt the parade was much better this year.

"Our only concern was ensuring that the event not serve as a platform for Israel-bashing and delegitimization efforts directed against the Jewish state. Indeed, QuAIA was not part of the Pride parade, so we are satisfied and appreciative that the organizers appear to have lived up to their undertaking," said Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canadian Council for Jewish and Israel Advocacy.

Justine Apple, executive director of Kulanu Toronto, the city's main Jewish gay and lesbian organization, said she and her members were also satisfied with this year's parade.

She said the events at the Dyke March and the QuAIA banner made some of her members feel "unwelcome."

"That was just another way for them to spew anti-Israel sentiment and it should never have been at the parade," she said. But that sentiment was overshadowed by the celebratory mood at Pride this year. "We feel it's important that Pride remain about celebration, tolerance and inclusivity."

Asked whether Kulanu feels the city should withhold this year's funding as a result of the QuAIA banner and the presence of other fringe anti-Israel groups at the parade this year, Apple said she "respectfully disagrees" with Mammoliti's position. Her organization wants Pride to get its money.

"Because QuAIA did stay out of the parade, their stain was removed this year and people were able to celebrate. By all counts, it was a successful day," she said.

James Pasternak, the city councillor for Ward 10 York Centre, told The CJN he also disagrees with Mammoliti's call to withhold funding.

He said there's still "a lot of work to do" to educate the public about QuAIA's messaging and encourage Pride Toronto's executive to continue training its staff and event marshals "so that they fully understand what's acceptable and what's not.

"That said, we've made a lot of progress since last year. I would think it's unwise for the [city] to yank the funding and potentially reverse some of the progress we've made," he said. "Remember, our goal is to make sure the demonizing and discriminatory phrase 'Israeli apartheid' is taken out of the public sphere in publicly funded events."

He said most of his fellow councillors also feel progress was made since last year and that Pride Toronto followed the parameters set out by city council this year.

Pasternak said he will seek to convene a debriefing session between the city and Pride organizers to determine what went "right and what didn't" at Pride this year.

New supermarket to have large kosher selection

Laura Fixman
Intern

Six aisles will be dedicated to kosher foods at the new FreshCo store at 800 Steeles Ave. W. near Bathurst Street, including a full-service meat counter, a deli and a frozen food section.

They can offer the kosher foods at lower prices, FreshCo general manager Rob Adams said, because they buy food in large volumes and they price check every week to make sure their prices are as low as or lower than those of their competitors.

"We make sure we have top quality products at lower prices," Adams said.

He said if customers aren't satisfied with a product's freshness, they will get their money back. If they find a cheaper price for something at another store, they just need to show the flyer and FreshCo will beat that price.

Although FreshCo is owned by Sobeys, Adams said, the new store, which opened last Friday, is not competing directly with the nearby Sobeys store.

"The Sobeys at Clark and Hilda has a more traditional supermarket offering," Adams said. "FreshCo is a discount store where we focus on low prices and having fresh, high quality product."

It also carries a variety of seasonal Ontario produce, meat and dairy products and fresh baked products delivered daily by local bakeries, in order to support Ontario growers and producers.

Adams added that they provide many international items that will be different at any given FreshCo store.

In addition to opening the new FreshCo store, Sobeys made another change in the area when Price Chopper at Bathurst Street and Cedarcroft Avenue closed last week. A Sobeys representative confirmed that the Price Chopper now at 6201 Bathurst St. on the south side of Steeles Avenue remains open.

Qualities of a leader

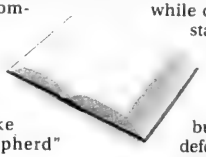
Rabbi Jordan D. Cohen

In this week's parshah, Moses receives notice from God that his death is imminent. Although previously told that he would not enter the Promised Land, Moses is permitted to view the land from the top of Mount Abarim. Before he ascends the mountain, Moses expresses one concern: who will lead the people after I am gone? Since he had to ask, it seems the answer was not self-evident.

Who could be a worthy successor to Moses? The Kotzker Rebbe taught that the answer was obvious: Pinchas, the zealot whose name titles this week's sidrah. Having demonstrated his unflinching fidelity to God and qualities of leadership through his single-handed efforts to purge the idolaters from Israel's midst, he seemed to be the natural choice. He was the man of the hour, rewarded by God and adored by the people. What other choice could there be?

Moses realized, however, that the exact characteristics that made Pinchas popular were not the right traits for a good leader. Pinchas, in a moment of crisis, took the law into his own hands. He was decisive, but acted in a rash and extreme manner. Even though his deed may have served to assuage God's wrath, it was not enough to sustain the people on a daily basis. Moses' own success as a leader came through consistency of vision. Moses never pushed people. He led them along. And so Moses' appeal to God was for a leader "who shall go out before them and come in before them, and who shall take them out and bring them in, so that God's community may not be like sheep that have no shepherd" (Numbers 27:17).

Rabbinic Reflections



In response to Moses' appeal, God identified Joshua Bin Nun as the new leader of Israel. Joshua was "one who has the spirit (ruach) in him."

Rashi explains ruach as "one who knows how to approach each person according to his own spirit." According to the midrash, Moses urged God to appoint a leader who could relate to every Israelite – even those with whom he disagreed. Joshua had been active throughout the arduous journey. He knew the people well, where they had come from and, more importantly, where they were going. Joshua worked for, and with, the community.

A leader, to be great, must be able to relate to the community in all of its diversity. Golda Meir, one of Israel's most famous and revered prime ministers, often held her late-night cabinet meetings in her home, around her kitchen table. There, while discussing matters of state and national policy, she served coffee and food, making sure everyone was well cared for. She, like Joshua, a builder of a nation and a defender of Israel's right to the land, concerned herself with her people on all levels.

The Torah instructs us that a great leader must be with the people, leading them daily, as well as during the difficult and perplexing times. A leader, like a shepherd, must not be remote but must take an active role in guiding the community.

Rabbi Jordan D. Cohen is spiritual leader of Temple Anshe Sholom in Hamilton, Ont.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Leading in the wilderness

We will soon conclude reading the Book of Numbers and begin Deuteronomy. There is an intrinsic difference between these two books. Although they are both equally part of the Torah, they do not reflect the same perspective. Tradition teaches us that the first four books of the Torah come directly from God, while the last book, Deuteronomy, is the words of Moses.

Midrashic Moments

Rachel Turkienicz

Moses was the leader of Israel through the wilderness. In fact, that is almost solely the realm of his leadership. For a brief period, Moses leads Israel out of Egypt, and the text shows us most of Moses' encounters are with God or with Pharaoh. There is little interaction between Moses and the people. Once free of Egypt, Moses leads the people directly to Sinai.

Once the Torah is delivered to Israel at Sinai, the time spent there turns into years as Moses teaches the people about the vision of a new society and how they are to fulfil that vision through commandments. He is their intellectual leader, their spiritual leader, their moral leader, but as for a physical leader moving from place to place, Moses does not undertake that since they are camped at Sinai.

It seems that Moses' leadership has been defined from the start. Moses facilitates redemption, revelation, education and vision. Israel doesn't need a tour guide since they weren't going anywhere complicated. The route was clear: out of Egypt, straight to Sinai, onward to Canaan. And then the Torah shows us that just as you think you've planned well enough for a trip and ask what could possibly go wrong, that is when life happens and everything you planned becomes meaningless.

As Israel is about to enter Canaan and complete Moses' mission, spies are sent into the land and 40 years are added to the journey. These 40 years are not simple years of idling but are years spent in the wilderness. A wilderness is both the most challenging environment as well as the most rewarding one. Both elements result from the same reason: the wilderness strips us of all reference points. Nothing we learned from society will be of assistance there, and we are broken down to our human essence as we try to survive the environment. Without steadfast leadership, all could be lost. Moses spent 40 years in the wilderness teaching us how to trust God and follow God's leadership.

Moses could have argued with God about how leading Israel for 40 years was not part of the original agreement at the Burning Bush. Israel may likewise have taught their children, the generation to enter Israel, that God could not be trusted – one little mistake with spies and your life journey is thwarted. Instead, both Moses and that generation rose to the unexpected and taught us the potential of what lies within.

The Midrash speaks of the covenantal promise to Abraham: "The children of Abraham are likened to the dust of the earth and to the stars of the sky. For when they fall, they fall as low as dust and when they rise, they rose as high as the stars.

Rachael Turkienicz is the director of Rachaelscentre.org.

Jewish-Italian friendship

In a recent article I wrote about the University of Toronto's upcoming participation in an excavation at the site of Tel Huqoq in the Galilee. The excavation is part of a project I am involved in that celebrates Jewish-Italian friendship. It was initiated by the consul general of Italy, Gianni Bardini, who was impressed by the co-operation between Jews and Italians in Toronto. He was also moved when he heard the testimony of Miriam Frankel, who as a young girl was deported to Auschwitz from her home in Italy.

Bardini wished to commemorate the close relationship between Jews and Italians. Initially, Edward Goldberg, founder of the Medici Archive Project in Florence, was brought over for a lecture. The project is studying the three million documents in the archives of the Medicis, the pre-eminent family of the Italian Renaissance. (One could say that the archives are the equivalent of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Cairo Genizah combined). Amazingly, more than 60,000 documents of the archives deal with the Jews of Tuscany. (Interestingly, it was they who first imported coffee to Italy).

Also, in November, as part of Holocaust Education Week, the Jewish-Italian Project, under Bardini's auspices, will be hosting an evening of lectures on the Holocaust in Italy. The event will be held at St. Michael's College at U of T, which also happens to be the home of one of the event's co-sponsors, the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

As its ongoing project, the Italian-Jewish venture has adopted something that embodies the essence of the initiative. It is a new archeological excavation in Israel located in the Galilee at Tel Huqoq. The Archaeology Centre at U of T, under the directorship of Prof. Michael Chazan, is a co-sponsor of the excavation, as is the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies of which I am the president. The project will be an ecumenical venture for U of T involving the Centre for Jewish Studies, as well as the departments of classics and Near and Middle Eastern civilizations.

Huqoq is a site that flourished in the late Roman and Byzantine Periods, from 330 CE until the Arab Conquest in 638 CE. Although the site was abandoned in the Middle Ages, it shows that there was a strong Jewish presence in Israel, especially in the Galilee, even after the disaster of the two revolts against Rome. Huqoq even possessed a synagogue, whose excavation will be an important part of the project.

It was here that Jesus conducted his ministry. His home in Capernaum (Kafer Nahum in Hebrew) was only 3.2 miles to the east of Huqoq, and the town of Migdal, the home of Miriam of Migdal (Mary Magdalene), was 2.8 miles to the south.

It is hoped that the excavations of Huqoq will cast more light on a crucial part of Jewish history. It was this period, and this region, that saw the emergence of an important pillar of Judaism, the Palestinian Talmud.

Apps, Apple and the Mideast

Apple has entered the Mideast conflict.

I am not suggesting the computer giant has taken a position on the turmoil thousands of kilometres from its California headquarters. Nevertheless, Apple has been drawn into the debate.

Thanks to the ubiquity of the iPhone and the iPad, developers have been creating applications that aim to convince users their cause is just. For example, the Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs app provides government press releases, policy statements, security updates and editorials. [http://bit.ly/midapp1]

On the other hand, the iGaza app delivers news from a very different point of view and includes sections with titles like Boycott, Prisoners, Casualties, Flotilla and Demolitions. It can generate a protest e-mail to the Israeli prime minister with the text, "I am appalled by the actions of your government in relation to the xxxxxxxx at xxxxxxx in which xxx died. I call on your government to immediately lift the illegal siege of Gaza." [http://bit.ly/midapp2]

But it was another app that made headlines. The Arabic language app ThirdIntifada, an offshoot of the website 3rdintifada.com, was released for the iPhone. According to AlJazeera.net, "Typical stories on 3rdIntifada.com describe demolitions of Palestinian homes by Israeli forces, the reported unearthing of a Muslim cemetery, and exhortations for Arabs in the Middle East to liberate Palestinians from 'Zionist occupation.'" [http://bit.ly/midapp3]

Yuli Edelstein, Israel's minister of public diplomacy, sent an e-mail to Apple CEO Steve Jobs asking him to have the ThirdIntifada app removed. Edelstein complained that from the "articles and photos published by means of the application, one can easily see that this is in fact anti-Israel and anti-Zionist. Furthermore, as is implied by its name, the application calls for an uprising against the State of Israel." [http://bit.ly/midapp4]

Unlike the web, where almost anything goes – especially if you set up a website in a country that has lax libel and hate laws – things are different at Apple. You can't create an app and distribute it to iPhones or iPads. Once a developer has produced an app, it must be submitted to Apple to make sure it conforms to its "acceptable use policy."

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

For example, Apple's policy on "religion, culture and ethnicity" states that "apps containing references or commentary about a religious, cultural or ethnic group that are defamatory, offensive, mean-spirited or likely to expose the targeted group to harm or violence will be rejected."

After the complaint by Edelstein, Apple had the app removed from its software store.

Edelstein praised Apple, but the approval wasn't universal. Writing in the New Statesman, Emanuelle Degli Esposti said publishing the app was "not the smartest move the company has ever made" but removing it raises "questions about Apple's political entanglements, and the extent of Israeli influence." [http://bit.ly/midapp5]

This certainly won't be the last time Apple will be called in to play peacemaker – or at least to ensure that all apps are being treated fairly. Despite increased competition from Android and BlackBerry, Apple still commands an impressive 59 per cent share of all apps downloaded onto mobile devices. [http://bit.ly/midapp6]

Apple should get used to its role as a new – and probably unwitting – participant in the Middle East debate.

HU turns scientific theory into practice

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Over the years, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem has developed a reputation for producing some of the world's best researchers, scientists and technologies.

And Hebrew U's research development company called Yissum, which is the university's technology transfer arm, has been working for nearly five decades to turn scientific theory into practice, allowing the rest of the world to benefit from the science.

Since Yissum was founded in 1964, 7,000 patents have been registered covering 2,023 inventions; 530 technologies have been licensed; 72 spinoff companies have been founded, and more than $2 billion in sales worldwide have been generated.

Last month, Hebrew U co-sponsored the Israeli presidential conference in Jerusalem and produced an exhibition called "Research Today for a Better Tomorrow."

The exhibit presented some of the university's most exciting projects, including Amir Amedi's "virtual cane," a technology that will change the way vision-impaired people navigate.

Amedi, a medical neurobiologist at Hebrew U and a researcher with the Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada (IMRIC) – a centre meant to encourage interdisciplinary partnerships between the best scientists Israel and Canada have to offer – developed a new technology that can help blind people navigate through certain obstacles by substituting the traditional white walking cane with a virtual one.

The technology, which was patented by Yissum, functions as a virtual flashlight.

The device, no bigger than a cell phone, emits a beam. When the beam comes into contact with an object ahead, it transmits the information – its height, its distance from the person – through a gentle vibration.

Amedi presented his invention to Israeli President Shimon Peres when he visited the Hebrew U exhibit at the conference.

Placing the device in Peres' hand, Amedi demonstrated how the virtual cane works.

"The device will detect if I come closer to you or move further away," he explained to Peres in Hebrew. "And if you move it from side to side, you'll see where I begin and where I end."

Another scientific breakthrough featured at the exhibit may be used for medical, as well as security purposes.

Hebrew U scientists developed a sensor that can detect a person's mental and emotional state through their sweat ducts.

This invention was based on a discovery that the capillaries, which lead to the sweat ducts on our skin, has a spiral structure similar to that of an antenna used for wireless communications systems.

They learned that electromagnetic waves reflect off the skin surface through the sweat ducts, and through this phenomenon, the scientists have been able to sense changes in a person's stress level.

This technology, which has also been patented by Yissum, could be applied at doctors' offices, as well as airport security. This invention could potentially sense malice, which could single out terrorists even if they aren't carrying weapons.

These are just two of the hundreds of applied technologies that have piqued the interests of scientists, engineers and entrepreneurs all over the world.

HydroElectron Ventures president and CEO Matthew Price Gallagher, is one example of a Canadian who wants to connect with Yissum, a transfer arm that specializes in applying scientific theory.

According to its website, the Montreal-based company "strives to tap into the full potential of the hidden nano-properties of water in order to find solutions to some of the world's most pressing issues," including energy, biomedicine and the environment.

Price Gallagher, who was in Jerusalem last month, said that his company was working with scientists at McGill University and Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) to further its water technology research.

"In the first five years or so we developed a fuel that brought fuel and water together. Normally fuel and water don't mix," Price Gallagher said, adding that they succeeded in commercializing it.

Amir Amedi

But within the last three years, since they began developing new water technologies that can have implications for the environment and clean energy, he said he began to grow frustrated with the research progression coming out of the universities because the scientists were focusing more on the theory rather than application.

"I started to learn about what was going on in Israel, especially in the area of science and technology, and of course, about water science being historically a strong suit, since water is a major issue there," he said.

He learned about the developments at Hebrew U when he met Ari Brojde, who is involved with the Montreal chapter of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University.

Brojde, whose family established the Peter Brojde Centre for Innovative Engineering and Computer Science at Hebrew U in 2008, in memory of his later father, told Price Gallagher that his company could benefit from the work they do in Jerusalem.

Price Gallagher, who had never travelled to Israel, and is not Jewish, was invited by Brojde to learn about the centre, as well as Yissum.

Impressed by what the centre and Yissum had to offer, Price Gallagher shared his research with the scientists at the centre, and began to pursue a deal with the university's transfer arm.

"There is a sense of a greater creative energy here and being an entrepreneur, I resonated with that," he said.

What makes this partnership unusual, Price Gallagher said, is that Yissum normally deals with licensing technologies that originate at Hebrew U.

"What is unique is that we've developed all the science and technology and we're bringing it all here... This deal with Yissum is not what they are used to," he said.

"But I hope our technologies can solve some of the problems that we have when it comes to clean energy."

Dealing with husband who fails to pay child support and hides income

Family Matters

John Syrtash

Question. My ex, who is registered with the Family Responsibility Office (FRO, the Government Collection Agency for child support), owes me almost $10,000 in child support. Due to the fact that he is a contractor with no real employment contract, I have been unable to collect funds. He helps out with support when my daughter visits him but as far as myself receiving funds, $0.

What can I do? I have contacted and written to the Family Responsibility Office numerous times. They have tried to enforce the Court's Order re: assets, but he has none. They have tried to revoke his Driver's license but he lost that anyway.

Answer: Ask the FRO if they have had his income tax refund or any other government monies owing to him seized. Also ask them if they have seized his Canadian passport. They can do that. Most importantly, ask them why they haven't bothered to commence "committal proceedings", meaning Court action that could lead to him being thrown in jail for several weeks at a time, until he finally pays.

If the FRO continues to stall or gives excuses, call your local Provincial MPP and complain that the FRO is not moving fast enough. Then keep bugging your MPP to have the FRO press the Courts to escort him to jail.

However, even if they threaten Court action, your ex may make an application to the Courts to vary the amount of child support owing. If that happens then the FRO often accepts some small nominal monthly payment with respect to the arrears so long as he maintains the ongoing monthly support payments pending a decision by the Courts. Nonetheless, in the absence of such deal-making, you should press the FRO to have him incarcerated — this and the passport route are your best way to go. If jail ever becomes a serious threat it's amazing how quickly these arrears get paid.

You can also go back to Court and ask for an increase in child support. When he tries to defend he will usually be unable to do so because of his arrears of support. In addition, it gives you the opportunity to investigate his sources of his revenue in the course of these proceedings. Your lawyer then has the right to review all of his revenue sources going back three years. Forensic accountants can also uncover undisclosed sources of revenue.

Couple donates $40M to multifaith school in U.S.

Josh Sayles
Special to The CJN

PHOENIX — A Paradise Valley couple donated $40 million last month – on top of a $10-million gift several years ago – to Claremont School of Theology (CST) in Claremont, Calif., to enable the 126-year-old school to co-found a multifaith institution of higher learning.

The new Claremont Lincoln University (CLU) is named after philanthropists Joan and David Lincoln. In addition to offering master's degrees and doctorates in areas of religious studies, CLU will serve as an umbrella organization that creates ties between Claremont School of Theology, a theological school of the United Methodist Church that ordains ministers; Academy for Jewish Religion, California (AJRCA), a nondenominational, pluralistic school that ordains rabbis and cantors, and the Islamic Center of Southern California (ICSC), which will open for the 2011-12 school year to educate Islamic leaders. AJRCA and ICSC are the other two founding members.

ICSC will not certify imams at this time, according to Claudia Pearce, director of CST public relations, because the title of imam can only be officially granted abroad. However, she said that ICSC hopes to become "the first certified Muslim imam program in the United States."

Pearce said that down the road, Claremont Lincoln would like to add schools for other religions, such as Buddhism and Hinduism.

CST president Jerry Campbell said the university is aiming for "a new interreligious environment where we teach our students to understand and respect one another. They'll know enough about one another that there's no longer fear or suspicion about the other's religion.

"We felt that clergy graduates in the 21st century should be well versed in other religions, because they have to be leaders in communities in which we're all interconnected," said Rabbi Mel Gottlieb, AJRCA president.

David Lincoln said that interreligious co-operation and collaboration has the potential to solve some of the world's conflicts.

"The most obvious one is the Israeli-Palestinian problem, but there are lots of others," he said. "There's the Northern Ireland problem between the Protestants and the Catholics, there's the Muslim problem between the Shiites and the Sunnis, there's the potential major problem between the Muslims and the Hindus between India and Pakistan.

Rabbi Mel Gottlieb

"No one religion or one sect of a religion can solve [these problems] by itself. The religions have to work together," Lincoln said.

A Cleveland-area native and California Institute of Technology graduate, Lincoln first moved to Arizona in 1931 at age 6. He has been a member of the Claremont board for several years, and is also active in Thunderbird Charities, John C. Lincoln Health Network and the Lincoln Institute of Land Policy. His wife, Joan, is a former mayor of Paradise Valley.

Lincoln identifies as Methodist but said that all religions are based on one tenet, which he calls "the golden rule: Treat others like you'd like to be treated."

He said it's the "only tenet that's common to all the religions of the world. And it's also a [rule of] ethics. The golden rule and ethics are pretty much the same thing."

Rabbi Gottlieb said that grassroots efforts in religious communities to promote understanding of other religions and cultures are a key ingredient in solving world conflicts, and interreligious education helps provide a platform for those efforts.

"We have a long way to go," he said. "But the Talmud says, 'It's not for us to complete the work, but neither are we free to desist from beginning it.'"

Ottawa student named in 'Top 20 Under 20' list

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Adam Moscoe's friends have been saying, for the past few years, that he's the perfect candidate for the Top 20 Under Twenty awards program.

The awards, presented by Youth in Motion, honour students who have demonstrated leadership and innovation in and dedication to community service.

In his last year of eligibility, at age 19, the Ottawa University student received the award. He was in Toronto recently to meet the other award recipients for a leadership summit and a reception.

In an interview, Moscoe recalled that he wasn't an outgoing or self-confident child, but that changed when he got involved in musical theatre.

"It helped me become more self-confident, and I really enjoyed working towards a goal with a group of people," he said.

He now uses drama and theatre to help people with developmental disabilities.

"Throughout high school, I taught drama in summer camps, and I saw kids with autism and ADHD [attention deficit hyperactivity disorder] develop a focus that they didn't previously have before."

Moscoe grew up in Ottawa, where he attended Nepean High School. He credits a teacher, Jon (Mr. T) Tenthorey, with introducing him to a world of "giving back."

Tenthorey ran a leadership development program called CORE, to equip students with the tools they need to succeed in community service work. After getting involved, Moscoe soon realized that he loved giving back to his community.

Encouraged by his mentor to help others, Moscoe and his friends, along with Tenthorey, developed a high school program called Branching Out To Help Out, to help students complete their mandatory community service hours in a meaningful way.

Adam Moscoe

Moscoe's passion for communityinvolvementwas only just beginning. After his high school made national headlines for the hazing of Grade 9 students, Moscoe and his peers founded a program called FUSE, to combat bullying and hazing by establishing mentoring relationships between seniors and freshmen. Through leadership camps, exam-preparation workshops, community service days and spring cleanup events, more than 300 students have been mentored by more than 80 graduating students.

In 2007, Moscoe received Ottawa's Spirit of the Capital Youth Award. "The Spirit Awards became central to my life, as I became co-chair of the gala, overseeing Canada's only youth-run program celebrating the achievements and talents of young people who overcame incredible barriers and emerged as brilliant leaders," said Moscoe.

After running this program for two years, Moscoe and two friends created TEDxYouthOttawa, a technology, entertainment and design (TED) event organized by youths, with speakers who were all under 25.

The TED programs, based on the philosophy that ideas are worth sharing, give local communities the tools to express their opinions on innovation and technology. As a result of the youth event's success, TED now has a separate department for events organized by young people.

Although he grew up with a strong Jewish identity, Moscoe never considered himself a leader in the Jewish community. This changed after he went to Israel and "got bit by the Zionist bug," he said.

"I discovered that my value of social justice was in line with the Jewish values of tzedakah and tikkun olam, and I developed a drive for Israel advocacy as well."

This year, he served as Hillel Ottawa's vice-president and the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' social justice and Jewish identity co-chair, as well as a Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee fellow.

Since 2009, he has co-ordinated Holocaust Education Week on Ottawa campuses and is working to collaborate with multi-faith groups on campus.

He co-organized two conferences this year, bringing together Jewish, Muslim and Christian student groups on campus and brought the Tzedakah-Sadaqah project to Ottawa.

"This program gives Jews and Muslims a chance to get together and to put their common values like social justice to action," said Moscoe.

"I never thought I would become friends with Muslim leaders on campus, but now I want to keep building these relationships."

Moscoe urges others to get involved in issues they care about.

"You don't have to get involved as a result of a difficult event or personal struggle – just do what you love. I have gotten so much gratification from the relationships that I've made as a result of my endeavours," he said.

This summer, Moscoe is working with Tamir, a Jewish organization that assists people with developmental disabilities. As well, he will study Jewish-German relations since the Holocaust at Humboldt University in Berlin.

You can't beat beets

By Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

Like many old favourites, beets are being given a contemporary and gourmet spin today. Note the recipe for Chilled Beet Soup with Dill Cream. Beets are becoming more and more popular, and you're also likely to see numerous versions of borscht claiming to the traditional version.

Buy beets with the greens still on them if possible. It means that they're much fresher, and the greens can be cut off and cooked like spinach. Pick beets of the same size so they'll cook uniformly. The skin should be smooth and unbroken. Ten two-inch beets will be enough for four servings.

Beets are high in vitamins A and C, complex carbohydrates, iron, fibre and potassium. They may be steamed or boiled, but I prefer to roast them so that they retain all of their nutrients and flavour. They are particularly delicious when roasted.

Raw beets can be stored in the refrigerator in an open plastic bag for up to one week before cooking. If you buy them in a sealed bag, punch several holes in the bag.

If you've never cooked fresh beets before, you need to know that they can stain your clothes – so use caution. They can also stain your hands. If they do, rub lemon juice or vinegar on your hands to remove the stains.

If your recipe calls for shredded or diced beets, you'll find it easier if you cook them first. Simply drop washed, unpeeled beets (with 2 inches of the greens and the roots still on) into a pot of boiling water and simmer until tender. Then, under cold running water, slip off the skins, slice off the top and the beets are ready for shredding or chopping.

Note that in any of these recipes, canned beets may be substituted, but there is nothing like the taste of fresh cooked beets.

CHILLED BEET SOUP WITH DILL CREAM

4 cups (or more) pareve chicken broth
16 oz. beets, peeled and chopped
1 cup chopped onions
3/4 cup peeled, chopped carrots
2 tsp. chopped garlic
1 tsp. sugar
2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill or 2 teaspoons dried dill
2 tbsp. chopped fresh chives or green onions
sour cream

Combine broth, beets, onions, carrots and garlic in a medium saucepan. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat; cover and simmer until the vegetables are very tender, about half hour. Cool slightly and puree in a blender or food processor until smooth. Transfer to a bowl. Thin with additional broth if soup is too thick. Mix in sugar and season with salt and pepper. Cover and chill until cold, at least 4 hours or overnight. Can be prepared two days ahead and kept refrigerated. Ladle soup into bowls and sprinkle with dill and chives. Top with sour cream. Serves 4.

BEET BORSCHT

4 medium size beets and tops
1 onion, peeled and shredded
4 cups boiling water
1 tbsp. salt
1/2 cup vinegar or 1/4 cup lemon juice
3 tbsp. brown sugar, or to taste

Wash beets and cut tops off two inches from the root. Boil for 15 minutes or until tender enough to pierce with a fork. Remove from pot and save water that beets have been cooked in. When cool enough to handle, slip skins from beets and shred them. Add grated onion to the beets and return to pot that beets were cooked in. Add boiling water to the water in the pot. (You can add chopped beet tops if desired.) Add salt and bring to a quick boil. Reduce heat and cook 5 minutes. Add vinegar and brown sugar. Serves 6.

Variation: meat borscht

Prepare beets as directed above, but after beets have been shredded, cook together with 1-1/2 to 2 pounds brisket. Cook 1-1/2 hours or until the meat is tender. Continue cooking as above. Thicken hot borsht by stirring in one egg yolk per serving.

QIC raps Quebec MLA for 'slanderous' remark on flotilla

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) denounced a reported comment by member of the National Assembly Amir Khadir on July 5 that Israel is taking advantage of a weakened Greece to force its government to prevent an international flotilla from sailing to Gaza.

Amir Khadir

The QIC termed the remark by the sole Québec solidaire (QS) MNA as "slanderous," suggestive of blackmail, and reminiscent of "the worst conspiracy theories accusing Jews of shadowy world economic and political power."

The QS supports the attempt by activists aboard 10 ships, that remained docked at a Greek port last week, to deliver what it calls humanitarian aid to the Palestinians of Gaza. QS member Manon Massé is aboard the Canadian vessel, the Tahrir.

"In the Greek ports, it is a blockade imposed by Israel, but executed by the Greek government, which is an insult to the Greek people, an abdication of its sovereignty," Khadir is quoted by La Presse Canadienne as saying.

"It's a very deplorable situation. The government of Greece is succumbing to Israeli pressure," noting the current economic crisis besetting the country.

The QIC said this is not the first time Khadir has made offensive comments about supposed Jewish influence. In June 2010, the organization noted, he accused the Quebec Jewish "lobby" of trying to "muzzle" the provincial government from condemning the deaths of nine activists aboard a Turkish ship that was blocked by the Israeli military from landing in Gaza.

"Mr. Khadir's obsession with Israel and Jews is such that he has lost all sense of reality and sees basses oeuvres [dirty politics] in international diplomatic positions," according to a QIC statement.

The QIC maintains that Greece is acting in conformity with the wishes of both the United Nations and European Union in blocking the flotilla from heading to Gaza in violation of the Israeli blockade.

Shul to count women in minyan

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Agudath Israel Congregation began to count women in its minyan on Erev Shavuot, June 7.

This was the culmination of a 10-year process of the congregation moving toward full egalitarianism, and joining the ranks of many Conservative congregations.

The decision to count women in the minyan and, in turn, to allow them to lead the prayer services, did not come quickly or without a great deal of study, discussion and consultation. Although women have for some time been able to lead some prayers and to be called to the Torah, they will now be able to lead all parts of the service and to blow the shofar during the High Holidays.

For Rabbi Charles Popky, the decision was a welcome one. "When I arrived to the congregation in 2004, I said that my goal was to eventually transform Agudath Israel into an egalitarian congregation.

"Every previous congregation I served was egalitarian, and I initially didn't apply to Agudath Israel because it wasn't egalitarian. I did not want to raise my daughters in a non-egalitarian environment, and it was uncomfortable being in such an environment. However, it was clear that increasing women's participation was a major concern of the [Agudath Israel] congregation," he said.

The synagogue's ritual committee spent almost a year studying the issue, during which there was also ongoing education of the congregation through sermons, classes and bulletin articles. Following the committee's recommendation to the synagogue board, a special Shabbat lunch and learn was held where Rabbi Popky presented sources and answered congregants' questions.

Having already solicited and received feedback from the congregation throughout the process, the board voted unanimously to pass the recommendation at its meeting on May 11.

Howard Cohen was president of the congregation during the lead-up to the board decision and was pleased to see the recommendation passed just a couple of weeks before his term in office ended.

"Women have been able to participate in our Torah services for several years now. I see this change in policy as a small incremental step that completes our congregation's halachic path towards greater engagement and equality in worship," Cohen said. "Egalitarianism is about everyone taking part in Jewish observance, quenching their thirst for Torah and being valued in synagogue life. It can only have a positive impact – not to mention doubling the number of potential lay-service leaders."

The congregation's cantor, Shneur Bielak, is offering classes to women who would like to learn how to lead the evening service, and it is hoped that in time it will become routine for women to lead all services there.

"Ultimately, we made the decision to become egalitarian for the same reason as the movement as a whole – we believe it is the right thing to do," said Rabbi Popky. "The riches of the Jewish tradition should not be kept from one half of our population – particularly at a time when we are concerned about Jewish continuity."

Ahava products back at the Bay this fall

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A new line of Ahava skin care products from Israel will be at the cosmetics counters of select Bay stores in Canada by September, Elana Drell Szyfer, Ahava's CEO for North America, says.

"It will be a completely new line," she said in a telephone interview from New York. "We're very much looking forward to it."

Shayne Tryon, the Bay's senior manager of service excellence, confirmed the message.

"Ahava is correct," he wrote in an e-mail exchange. "We will be carrying the line at select Bay stores this fall.

"The exact date has not been confirmed, but we are working closely with Ahava and are ready to introduce the brand as soon as the product is ready for distribution."

The news comes about 18 months after the Hudson's Bay Company (HBC) was embroiled in a controversy in which it was accused of bowing to pressure from the pro-Palestinian Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME) to have HBC and Sears boycott Ahava products as part of the boycott, divestment, sanctions

(BDS) campaign.

That campaign has been cited as the reason Ahava's lease at its Covent Garden store in London was not renewed.

Last week, The CJN received a call claiming that the Bay outlets across Canada "are not carrying Ahava anymore."

Simply not true, said Drell Szyfer, who several months ago succeeded Yacov Ellis as Ahava's North American CEO. "Ahava will be at [Bay] stores by the fall."

In an e-mail exchange, Sara Saber-Freedman, a top official with the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), said factors contributing to the delayed availability of the new Ahava product line in Canada included "the need to adapt the new packaging to Canadian bilingualism requirements, Ahava's change of Canadian agent and brand repositioning."

Drell Szyfer said the controversy of January 2010 was fuelled by false media reports linking HBC's "quietly" removing Ahava products from shelves of the Bay in Canada "for business reasons" – reportedly inadequate sales performance – to the CJPME campaign.

Also not helping things, critics said, was HBC's lack of a coherent public relations response when approached by Ahava consumers.

CIC/UIA Federations Canada and Ahava finally felt compelled to issue a joint statement declaring that HBC would never bow to political pressure in regard to any of the products in its stores.

Drell Szyfer last week reiterated that Ahava products were removed from Bay stores only in anticipation of remaking and rebranding the line. The fact that the removal took place at the same time as the CJPME campaign was, she emphasized, purely coincidental.

Although she could not specify the exact number of Bay stores that would carry the new Ahava line, they will definitely include stores in Montreal, Toronto and other cities, Drell Szyfer said. The line, she said, will also not be exclusive to the Bay.

Ahava is known for incorporating mud and minerals mined from the Dead Sea into its products for their purported cleansing and therapeutic qualities.

Lebovic campus not expected to be affected

The budgetary cuts are not expected to affect building plans for the Lebovic Campus in Vaughan, where the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, a new Jewish community centre, is under construction and expected to open in fall 2012 – on time and on budget, Sokolsky noted. He added that summer camp will run in advance of the official opening, and that construction will begin on Bialik Hebrew Day School's north building. As well, a Reena Community Residence is being built.

The Lebovic Campus, as well as the Sherman Campus further south on Bathurst Street, are being funded through campaigns that are separate from the annual UJA effort. Togther with the Miles Nadal JCC and the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, both downtown, the projects total over $225 million in new facilities, Sokolsky said.

He said that although fundraising for the Sherman Campus is going well, "people are a little more cautious about taking risks. We've got to raise more money than maybe we would have in another [economic] environment."

He said he hopes that within a year, the federation would be in a position to break ground on the building that will replace the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, located north of Sheppard Avenue. The BJCC closed in September 2009 and was demolished last year.

About $68 million has been raised for the project, which would constitute Phase 2 of the plans for the campus, which also includes the Lipa Green Centre and the Donald Gales Family Pavilion. The projected costs for Phase 2 total about $95 million, plus $10 million in endowment funds. Phase 2 will include a health and fitness centre, as well as new homes for the Holocaust Centre, the Koffler Centre and a Jewish museum. It is expected to take three years to complete, which means it would open in late 2014 at the earliest.

"I don't like the idea that the grass is there, and the building isn't," Sokolsky said, referring what is now an open field. However, he added, essential services are being delivered, day care, camp and sports leagues are full, seniors' activities are "as busy as ever," and membership is growing at the health club.

"I would say the recession has slowed us down," Sokolsky said. "When we started, we were more ambitious about a timetable, but I feel really good about the response of the major donors."

New burial area will have own entrance

For interfaith burials, Shaarey Zedek will be redeveloping a portion of the cemetery that is now used for storage and is unconsecrated ground. The new portion will be separate from the current cemetery and have its own entrance and driveway. Staniloff said that non-Jewish bodies will not be transferred through the older portions of the cemetery

The plots in the new section will be sold in pairs. While interfaith couples will be buried together, Jewish symbols only will be allowed in the section.

The Chesed Shel Emes will continue to prepare the Jewish bodies for burial, with the non-Jewish bodies prepared in a Jewish manner by a non-Jewish funeral home.

Staniloff reports that the Shaarey Zedek's ritual chair has been in constant contact with the Chesed Shel Emes ritual committee and executive director.

The Shaarey Zedek is not the first congregation in Winnipeg to offer interfaith burials. The first was Temple Shalom, Winnipeg's Reform congregation. When asked why the Chesed Shel Emes will prepare Jewish bodies for the new Shaarey Zedek interfaith burials but not for Temple Shalom burials, chesed executive director Rena Boroditsky said that the main difference is that the Shaarey Zedek cemetery is Jewish-owned, while Temple Shalom buries its dead in a non-Jewish-owned cemetery.

Staniloff acknowledged that the Shaarey Zedek's decision is "problematic." He said that Rabbi Green consulted with a leading Orthodox rabbi in the United States, as well as local Orthodox rabbis, about how to implement interfaith burial.

Rabbi Ari Ellis, the spiritual leader of Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Congregation, Winnipeg's largest Orthodox congregation, confirmed that Rabbi Green spoke with him about the subject. While Rabbi Ellis will continue to conduct funerals for his congregants who have plots in the main portion of the cemetery, he said he's unhappy with the Shaarey Zedek's decision.

"This is a religious issue that should have been decided by religious authorities, not by a vote from among the lay members," he says. He used the word "desecration" to describe what the Shaarey Zedek is going to do.

He wondered why the Shaarey Zedek didn't buy a plot of land somewhere else, as the shul will run out of room in the existing cemetery at some point.

Staniloff said that the Shaarey Zedek board did consider purchasing land elsewhere for the new cemetery, adding that land is scarce and expensive. He said that what the Shaarey Zedek is choosing to do may not be the best solution but added that the move is necessary in order to maintain a growing Jewish community.

The next steps, he said, are to arrange the building permits and hire a contractor. "If everything goes as scheduled, we hope to be able to start selling our new plots by the fall. Thus far, we have had only positive response."

'Potential to stigmatize non-participants'

Jewish youngsters could be affected in situations in which they are a minority and a religious majority held such prayers.

"It has the potential to stigmatize non-participants and gives the potential to give an official seal of approval to a given religion," said Morgan, who has served as CJC's president.

According to the Globe and Mail, Jim Spyropoulos, superintendent of inclusive schools for the TDSB, said, "I think it's important to note the prayer isn't conducted under the auspices of the board. The [school] principal was creative enough to sit down with parents and come up with a solution that worked for everyone and there has not been a single complaint."

A spokeswoman for the board said the prayers are entirely run and paid for by the Valley Park community. More than 300 students take part, without missing class time, the Globe reported.

Sitting can be bad for your health

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

Statistics Canada found that adults spend an average of 9.5 hours on their butts a day, while children spend an average of 8.6 hours a day on theirs.

A new Canadian study suggests it's not just the length of time we spend sitting down but the number of times we get up that can influence our health. New research out of Australia found that long periods of sitting down, even in people who did a lot of exercise, resulted in higher mortality rates, higher than more active individuals. Previous studies have told us that engaging in moderate to vigorous activity one to three hours a week reduces the risk of an early death. The results of this study indicate that while exercise did reduce risk of early death, even high levels of exercise – four to seven hours a week – did not overcome the influence of high levels of inactivity, such as sitting, on mortality risk.

We all know that living an active lifestyle can significantly improve our quality of life and reduce the risk of getting more than 25 diseases. Yet only 15 per cent of Canadian adults get enough exercise by meeting the recommended amount of 150 minutes of moderate to vigorous activity per week, and only 35 per cent meet the recommended 10,000 steps per day.

According to a Queen's University study, incidental activity during sedentary periods – even walking to talk to a colleague instead of calling or e-mailing – can offer some benefits to our health. Standing is better than sitting, but leisurely walking is better than standing when it comes to your health. The more activity people engage in and the faster people move, the better their level of fitness. This research proves that how you spend the hours of your day count, and count in a big way so go on, so don't just sit there, get up, go for a walk or take the stairs. Your body will thank you for it.

JERUSALEM — On the face of it, the so-called Gaza Freedom Flotilla seemed to be a bust.

Greek authorities blocked most of the boats from setting sail for the Gaza Strip, and others experienced propeller problems that rendered them unseaworthy.

Analysis

On Tuesday, a small pleasure boat with eight passengers aboard became the first vessel in the planned flotilla to elude the Greek coast guard en route to Gaza.

But if the true aim was to achieve a public relations victory rather than to deliver aid to Gaza – as Israeli authorities charged and flotilla participants themselves acknowledged – then the thousands of news reports about the flotilla's plans, problems and participants succeeded by at least one measure: getting attention.

"Given the tremendous obstacles placed in the way of the flotilla, we should not for a moment think this work has been in vain. Just the opposite," Leslie Cagan, co-ordinator of the U.S. boat to Gaza, wrote this week on the U.S. to Gaza website.

"We have called greater attention to the urgent need to end the Israeli blockade and siege of Gaza, as well as the overall occupation of the Palestinian Territories."

Reveling in the attention, pro-Palestinian activists talked to reporters about their next publicity stunt: a planned "fly-in" to Ben-Gurion Airport in Tel Aviv beginning Friday to protest Israeli policies vis-a-vis the Palestinians.

Hoping to disrupt airport operations, the activists reportedly are planning to declare "Palestine" as their destination upon landing in Israel; they have said they will stage demonstrations if denied entry.

Greece prevented the Audacity of Hope and other flotilla ships from leaving its ports in what was seen as a sign of a renewed friendship with Israel. [USTOGAZA.org]

This year's flotilla was organized to mark the anniversary of last year's flotilla to Gaza, which set sail from Turkey before being stopped by the Israeli Navy on May 31, 2010.

When one of the vessels refused to heed Israeli warnings to desist, Israel Defence Forces commandos stormed the boat, the Mavi Marmara, and nine Turkish passengers were killed amid the fighting. The incident prompted an international outcry and sent Turkish-Israeli relations to a nadir.

The 2011 flotilla came on the heels of an announcement by Israel that it would allow building materials into Gaza for 1,200 homes and 18 schools.

Adam Shapiro, an organizer of the Free Gaza Movement, said the announcement was a sign that the flotilla had resulted in real gains.

He attributed the change to "flotilla pressure."

"Even this year, the concrete results of the flotilla are evident," Shapiro wrote in a column in Gulf News, a news outlet in the United Arab Emirates.

Israel did not offer a reason for the timing of the decision, but said the construction material was for specific projects. An official with the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, which is overseeing the projects, said the announcement on the building material came after much negotiation.

On Sunday, organizers of the flotilla rejected an offer by Greece to deliver aid to Gaza from the ships stuck in Greek harbors via either Egypt or Israel.

Many pro-Israel supporters praised Greece for its handling of this year's flotilla, including American Jewish groups.

After delays from a countrywide strike and intensive port inspections, the Greek government on July 1 banned all ships bound for Gaza from leaving its ports.

John Klusmire, the captain of one of the ships, the Audacity of Hope, tried to leave port last week but was arrested on charges of setting sail without permission and endangering the lives of passengers. On Tuesday, a Greek court freed him and dropped the charges.

Greece's approach to the flotilla was held up as a sign of the renewed friendship between Greece and Israel. Israel has been cultivating a closer relationship with Greece, particularly as Israel's relationship with Turkey – a longtime rival of Greece – has faltered.

In the year since last year's flotilla fiasco, Greek Prime Minister George Papandreou and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu have exchanged visits, and Israel has offered military assistance to Greece. Last week the two countries completed a joint military exercise.

If any ships were to get past Greek authorities, Israel's Cabinet issued an order for the IDF to prevent any boats from reaching Gaza.

Israel says the flotilla is illegal and that military action to keep ships from arriving in Gaza is legitimate. Its partial blockade of Gaza is necessary, Israel says, to keep weapons from flowing into the strip, which is controlled by the terrorist group Hamas. The blockade of Gaza is designed as well to maintain pressure on Hamas to release Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, who was taken captive in an attack five years ago and is believed to be in Gaza.

The blockade has eased significantly since last year's flotilla incident, when Israel came under heavy international pressure to loosen the embargo.

Hamas last week called on the European Union and human rights organizations to pressure the Greek government to allow the ships to sail. On Tuesday, activists from the Spanish-sponsored boat in the flotilla reportedly occupied the Spanish Embassy in Athens after meeting with their ambassador to petition the Spanish government to pressure the Greeks to allow them to sail.

Meanwhile, Greek officials are working to learn the identity of the captain of a Canadian ship that slipped past Greek authorities near Crete for a few minutes before being intercepted by the Greek coast guard. Thirty passengers aboard the ship reportedly claimed to be the captain when questioned by port officials.

Two of the flotilla ships were victims of what flotilla organizers called deliberate sabotage; the Irish-flagged Saoirse was seriously damaged on June 28, and the propeller of the Juliano, on which Swedish, Norwegian and Greek activists were scheduled to travel, was discovered to be broken. Organizers blamed Israel for the problems.

Israeli Foreign Ministry officials denied the charge, according to The Jerusalem Post. The flotilla activists must feel they are in a "James Bond film," a spokesman said, according to the paper.

Swiss: No cement for you

The Swiss company that had sold cement to Swedish activists planning to sail to Gaza as part of an international aid flotilla said last week that due to "force majeure," it had decided to cancel the deal.

Interbulk has sold the Swedish delegation some 3,000 tons of cement, which were meant to be transferred to Gaza as aid on the Swedish-Greek-Norwegian ship, Free Mediterranean, as part of a Gaza flotilla.

Interbulk intends on returning the 25,000 euros it had gotten from the organizers, who gathered the money from thousands of donors in Sweden over the course of the past year.

In a letter it sent to the Gaza flotilla organizers, the Swiss company said that it had to cancel the deal due to "force majeure", and attributed the move to the Greek government's ban on Gaza-bound ships as well as to a letter by UN chief Ban Ki-moon discouraging Mediterranean countries from supporting the departure of the Gaza flotilla from their ports.

Israel blocks flights

Israel successfully prevented the entry of 200 passengers attempting to fly into Israel's Ben-Gurion International Airport last week in a bid to stymie an influx of pro-Palestinian activists to the country, according to the police.

The 200 activists were on a list of 342 blacklisted passengers scheduled to arrive in Israel, submitted by the Transportation Ministry to foreign airlines on Thursday.

Israeli police warned activists ahead of time that they would not be allowed entry to the country, however dozens of pro-Palestinian activists staged a protest at Charles de Gaulle airport in Paris after being barred from boarding their flights to Tel Aviv.

Lebanon approves Hezbollah-backed govt.

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Hezbollah-backed Lebanese government of Prime Minister Najib Mikati won last week a parliamentary vote of confidence after three days of heated debate.

Lebanon's new government won the votes of 68 lawmakers in the 128-seat parliament.

Parliamentarians loyal to former prime minister Saad Hariri of the Western-backed coalition walked out of the chamber as the voting began.

The three-day deliberations in parliament saw heated exchanges between the Hezbollah-led lawmakers and allies of Hariri, whose government was toppled by the group and its allies in January over a dispute regarding the United Nations tribunal into the 2005 killing of his father, former premier Rafik Hariri.

Lebanese and Israeli troops exchanged fire on the border last August killing two Lebanese soldiers, in what appeared to be the most serious military confrontation since Israel's war with Hezbollah in 2006. It remains unclear what will happen with the new Lebanese government in power. [Flash 90 photo]

Hariri was killed on Feb.14, 2005 in a massive bomb blast in a seaside area of Beirut. His allies during their speeches in parliament said the new cabinet was a result of a "coup against democracy."

Shortly before his 30-member cabinet was granted a vote of confidence Mikati promised that his government "confirms it will continue the path of the tribunal ... and continue to co-operate in this regard as per the UN Security Council Resolution, which set up the tribunal to see justice served."

Hezbollah has blasted the UN tribunal as being "a U.S.-Israeli plot which is targeting Hezbollah and Syria."

On June 30, the UN court, set up in the Hague in 2009 to probe suspects in the Hariri case, issued warrants against four members of the Lebanese Shiite group, prompting Hezbollah chief Hassan Nasrallah to pledge that the group will not hand over any of the suspects.

Activists on undesirables lists

The activists, many of them French but also at least one German, only discovered that they appeared on the list of undesirables when they arrived for their flights, they reported in videos posted online and on social networking site Twitter.

German carrier Lufthansa and other airlines, including Alitalia and Hungarian airline Malev informed the blacklisted passengers that they were not allowed to check in because their names were on a list of "undesirable people" that had been circulated to the airlines.

Lufthansa barred 50 pro-Palestinian activists from boarding an Israel-bound flight from Paris via Frankfurt because they appeared on the Transportation Ministry's list.

A spokesperson for the German airline in Israel, Tal Muskal told Haaretz that the group was demonstrating at the check-in area in terminal 1 at Charles de Gaulle Airport.

Muskal said that just like other European airlines, Lufthansa received a list of passengers who would not be allowed entry at Ben-Gurion Airport.

Some passengers booked on Alitalia flights managed to check in but were refused permission to board.

"Roissy [airport] under a blockade, Lufthansa collaborators," some of the passengers in the airport's Terminal 1 shouted.

"Roissy-Charles de Gaulle is under Israeli occupation," the co-ordinator of the France chapter of the campaign, Olivia Zemor, accused.

"This is an infringement of our freedom to travel," one frustrated French passenger said in a video posted on YouTube.

The activists are part of the Welcome to Palestine campaign, which had organized a "flytilla" to the Middle East this weekend for solidarity visits in the Palestinian territories.

They were due to arrive through Ben-Gurion International Airport in Tel Aviv, where hundreds of police had been deployed in anticipation of their arrival.

JERUSALEM — Israel's government approved a plan that will provide a uniform formula for the spelling of the names of communities and other sites around the country.

The uniform spellings will appear on maps and road signs, in textbooks and guidebooks, and in all other official publications, according to the plan.

The spelling of interchanges, junctions and historic sites will also be made uniform under the plan.

The new rules will be determined in accordance with the official map index formulated by the government names committee, and designed to create uniform spelling rules that have not been changed since 1957.

The plan has proved controversial for Arab lawmakers, after Transportation Minister Yisrael Katz said he would change the Arabic names of mixed communities to a Hebrew transcription; for example changing the Arabs' name for Jerusalem, Al-Quds, to Yerushalayim spelled in Arabic letters.

Non-profit educates consumers about personal finance

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A very savvy businessman once observed that many of the people he came across seemed to be constantly in debt. "It's not how much you earn," he concluded, "it's how much you spend."

The author of that observation, my late father, never went to business school and his command of the English language would never be mistaken for Shakespearean, but he did manage to identify a problem that plagues Canadians in record numbers.

According to a recently released report by the Certified General Accountants Association of Canada, household debt reached a record $1.41-trillion in December 2010 – $176,461 for a family of four – an amount 2.5 times greater than in 1989.

Living within one's means has apparently fallen out of favour with many Canadians, who are increasingly taking on mortgages they can't afford and who are putting everyday purchases on credit cards while making only the minimum monthly payments.

Enter Consolidated Credit Counselling Services of Canada, a non-profit organization dedicated to helping Canadians get out from under the burden of debt and get their finances in order.

Jeffrey Schwartz, Consolidated's executive director, agrees that, "people are spending more than they are making. How people get to that point is what we try to work with."

Schwartz, a successful businessman in his own right who co-founded the non-profit registered charity, Jacob's Ladder, a Canadian foundation for the control of neurodegenerative disease, suggested much of the problem could be attributed to a lack of self-discipline.

"Over the last 20 years, we've been fairly self-indulgent and people don't have a clear picture over the differences between what we want and what we need."

As a result, Canadians are increasingly "using their homes as equity to leverage more money and spend more."

Over-spending can arise in a number of ways. When shopping for groceries, people opt for the convenience – and cost – of corner stores rather than going out of their way to shop at a discount grocer, he said.

"The latte factor" plays a big part as well. "We want things we can make at home for a fraction of the cost," he said.

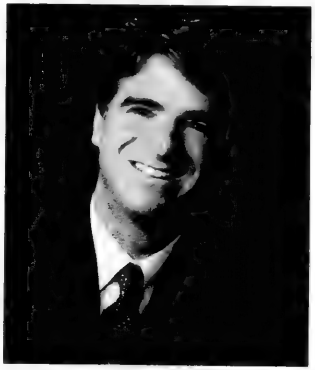
But can one $5 cup of coffee really make a difference in someone's personal finances?

"It adds up on a daily basis," Schwartz explained. One $5 coffee per day amounts to well over $1,800 per year. "To feed that spending frenzy, you've got to find [the money] because you're not earning it."

Other indulgences are even more costly. A single pack of cigarettes can run more than $9. A pack-a-day smoker will spend more than $3,200 a year on their habit.

'The latte factor' plays a big part

The purchase of big-ticket items that seemed like a good deal at the time can also hit the pocketbook. A $2,000 TV can be purchased with no money down and no payments for 18 months. "That's attractive to a lot of people," Schwartz said.



Jeffrey Schwartz

However, "If you can't pay it off in full, you can pay up to 30 per cent interest."

People put their purchases on credit because the monthly payments seem manageable. But people carry those debts for years and years and the interest adds up, he said.

A recent trend has seen others leverage their home equity to borrow cash. Lines of credit, "which traditionally were used for big purchases, are now being used for day-to-day needs," Schwartz said.

Consolidated Credit, which employs 30 people with experience in financial services, educates its clients about the true cost of credit and how to get their finances in order.

In addition to fielding as many as 40,000 telephone calls a year, the organization runs information seminars at corporate offices, where it lectures staff and management on financial issues.

Consolidated teaches "better money management," in part by urging clients to cut down on the daily lattes and big ticket purchases.

"We sit down, do an assessment" and examine how the client got into difficulty. Consolidated's staff then helps put together a budget, which Schwarz noted "is a four-letter word for some people."

Consolidated's staff helps clients "break bad habits. It's almost a financial diet.

"We put them on a realistic spending plan so they don't have problems further on in life.

"We look at how to reduce spending, if that's one of the issues. We work with clients to reduce their interest rates with creditors, so that more of their [payments] goes to principal and so we can reduce the overall sums [owing]."

The organization also maintains working relationships with a number of creditors, like banks and trust companies, and co-operates with them to reorganize their clients' debts.

"Creditors see a benefit in not having a bankrupt client," Schwarz said. They also realize that a client who gets their finances under control becomes "a better borrower."

Because Consolidated has a track record of working with borrowers and creating a spending plan that makes financial sense, creditors are more apt to agree to a debt-reorganization than if the client approached the lender himself, Schwartz added.

"By the time we talk to [the creditors], [the clients] are ready."

Consolidated's website offers a number of educational tools, including a "budgeting 1.01" course, saving tips for new families, resource material for newcomers to Canada, a wedding planner book and guides for parents on how to talk to youngsters about money.

Young cancer survivors raise awareness of disease

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — On Nov. 18, 2009, Stephanie Weschler celebrated her 32nd birthday and the birth of her first child, Marley.

Two days later, she was told that what doctors had thought was a cyst on one ovary, detected by ultrasound during her pregnancy, was, in fact, a malignant growth. She learned that her caesarean section included the removal of a 2-1/2-pound tumour.

Her joy at becoming a mother, her career as a lawyer in a major firm, her happy marriage to Howard, all faded into the background with the shocking news. A couple of weeks after Marley's birth, she began intensive chemotherapy, which was successful.

Weschler and Neil Rubin, also a cancer survivor in his early 30s, were the honorees at a New Leadership Division of the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) fundraising cocktail held at the SUCO lounge in the Opus Hotel. The evening was called "Living Proof," suggesting that, while cancer can strike the young, advancement in medicine is offering far better outcomes.

Weschler realizes that, in a way, she was lucky. "If I had not been pregnant, they would never have found the tumour as early. I was feeling fine. That's why they call ovarian cancer the silent killer.

"My doctor told me, 'Just thank God for your daughter.' Because of her, it was caught before it spread," said Weschler, who today looks radiant.

Her treatment over three months was gruelling – she received chemo five days in a row, all day long, at certain points.

"I couldn't take care of my baby. My mother and husband, Howard, were her primary caregivers," she said.

For a new mother to have to cope with a life-threatening illness was a cruel fate, but having a newborn kept her going. "I had no choice but to be positive. I had to be strong for Marley," she said.

Weschler accepted the ICRF tribute and is sharing her story because she realized during those long days she spent at the Jewish General Hospital's Segal Cancer Centre that she was benefiting from research and technology that been made possible because of others' donations.

"It's not like me to be in the spotlight, but the money people raised saved me," she said

Weschler returned to work at Stikeman Elliott, one of the sponsors of the evening, last September, as she had planned to before she became ill.

"It may be a cliché, but I appreciate life a lot more than I did. My perspective has changed. The little things don't bother me. I'm using the good crystal glasses now, and not waiting for a special occasion," Weschler said.

Eleven years ago, Rubin "felt as if [his] whole life was being defined by cancer."

At just 20, he was diagnosed with testicular cancer and underwent six weeks of chemotherapy.

Today, he is not only well, but a father. He and his wife, Andy, have two children, Lexi and Tristan.

"Thirty years ago, testicular cancer was a death sentence. Today, it has an extremely high cure rate due to the incredible progress we have made," said Rubin, who is digital brand manager at the movie and TV production company Cineflex.

The ninth annual benefit evening raised close to $100,000, which is to be donated to a young adult oncology research project done in Montreal by an ICRF-funded scientist for a three-year period.

In addition, say Living Proof co-chairs Gillian Eliahoo and Neilly Kornitzer, the New Leadership Division will continue to raise awareness about cancer among young adults.

A special guest was 2010 American Idol finalist Jay Stone who gave a performance of his stunning beatboxing, or vocal percussion. To underline the celebratory mood, guests were asked to wear their most colourful chic attire, and the décor, under the direction of Michelle Becker, was similarly vivid.

ICRF's Montreal division supports Israeli researchers at a number of local hospitals, including the ICRF laboratory at the Segal Cancer Centre, where Dr. Ilan Bruchim, in collaboration with Dr. Walter Gottlieb, the JGH's director of gynecological oncology, are conducting clinical research on a new treatment for ovarian cancer that it is hoped may replace highly toxic chemotherapy.

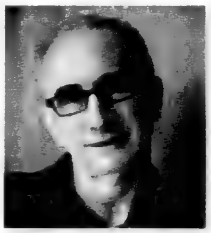
Mystery reflects cultural diversity of Toronto

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

The wine flowed and the hors d'oeuvres were plentiful at Ben McNally Books, where some 200 people gathered for the May launch of Robert Rotenberg's latest legal thriller, The Guilty Plea.

Rotenberg, 58, the Toronto criminal lawyer turned mystery writer, made Canadian publishing history, when the rights to his first book, Old City Hall (Simon & Schuster 2009), became the subject of an intense bidding war in New York back in 2008. He ended up landing a substantial advance and a contract for two books. Old City Hall became a Canadian best seller and has since been published in 40 countries and translated into nine languages.



Robert Rotenberg

The Guilty Plea, (Touchstone, a division of Simon and Schuster, 2011), the second book in this murder mystery series set in Toronto, features characters and settings that reflect the cultural diversity of the city.

The highlight of the book launch was the announcement by Kevin Hanson, president of Simon & Schuster Canada, that the company would be publishing two more books in the series.

"It seems to capture the essence of what Toronto really is," Hanson told The CJN, commending Rotenberg on his ability to link all the characters and subplots into the suspenseful main story line. "It's a real page turner."

He said one of the reasons for the series' international popularity is that people from other countries are interested in seeing how Rotenberg portrays their respective cultures within the multicultural mesh of Toronto's ethnic communities.

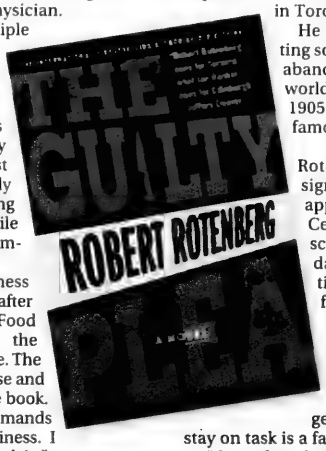
Indeed, what gives The Guilty Plea its substance is the cast of characters with their ongoing story lines. These characters, which are well developed, reappear in each book as the plot unfolds and moves from the investigation stage to the courtroom.

Fast forward to June and Rotenberg has just added another feather to the proverbial cap: CTV has signed on to do a continuing drama series based on his books. In a recent telephone interview he said he has just been given the green light to go public about the television deal. "The dream is that if the TV show happens, it is fast tracked for September 2012. The TV series will help sales of the books."

The plot of both books revolves around the meticulous investigative work of the protagonist, Ari Greene, a Jewish homicide detective. Rotenberg described him as "the moral center." While the other characters go through many life changes, Greene's life is more stable.

Rotenberg said he has deliberately created an aura of mystery about Greene, and was coy about what may or may not be revealed about the detective in subsequent books.

We do know that Greene has a close relationship to his father, a wily Holocaust survivor with a wry sense of humour. The widower resides in a bungalow in the Lawrence and Bathurst area, the neighbourhood where Rotenberg grew up. He said there were many Holocaust survivors in the area. Greene's father is a composite of the parents of some of his childhood friends. In contrast, Rotenberg's own father, the late Dr. Cyril Rotenberg, was a Canadian-born and educated physician.



The Guilty Plea depicts multiple generations of a wealthy family in the grocery and produce business. Rotenberg said he was interested in exploring the impact of successive generations on the outcome of a strong family business. As he puts it: the first and second generation commonly devote their lives to establishing and building the business, while it is often squandered by the pampered third generation.

Originally, the family business was going to be scrap metal, but after visiting the colourful Ontario Food Terminal, Rotenberg switched the business to groceries and produce. The sprawling terminal with all its noise and colour, figures prominently in the book. "I wanted to show the daily demands of running a fresh produce business. I wanted to show how tough the work is."

Another theme he explored was that of the smart outsider, who couldn't, despite his or her intelligence, fit into a new social setting. In The Guilty Plea, Samantha Wyler, the accused, is a bright woman from the northern Ontario town of Cobalt, however, she never really adapts to the big city. "I wanted her to be a character, who is smart," Rotenberg explained, "but who could not read the [social] cues in Toronto."

He said he was also interested in setting some of the story in Cobalt a "nearly abandoned" mining town that was the world biggest silver mine back in 1905. "At the time, it was the most famous Canadian city."

In promoting The Guilty Plea, Rotenberg has done multiple book signings across the city, and he appeared at Authors at Harbourfront Centre on June 22. Despite this hectic schedule he finds time to write every day, parent three children and practice criminal law. "I'm still working for the bad guys," he quipped.

In the meantime, the third book is completed and he has already started the fourth book in the series. When asked where he gets his discipline, Rotenberg suggested that this ability to focus and stay on task is a familial trait.

"One of my brothers is a tax lawyer, another is a writer and teacher, and one runs a pharmaceutical company. We just get stuff done."

Jewish artifacts are displayed in a new ROM gallery

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

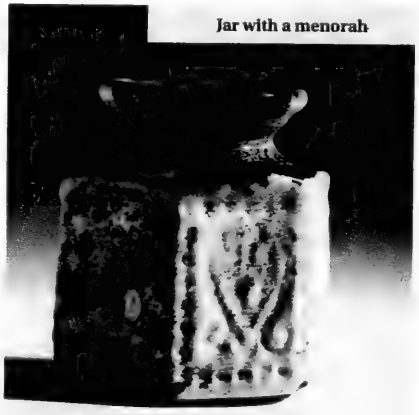
The Royal Ontario Museum has unveiled an ensemble of four new galleries on the ancient empires of Rome, Byzantium and Nubia, all supplemented by videos shot on location in Europe, the Middle East and Africa.

Janet Carding, the director and chief executive officer of the museum, said this was "a key moment" for the Toronto museum.

These civilizations span 2,500 years of history and had a lasting influence on art, esthetics, architecture and religion, said Carding.

The galleries – which add approximately 7,000 square feet of exhibit space to the museum – were opened on July 1.

The new galleries consist of the Eaton Gallery of Rome, the Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Gallery of Byzantium, the Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Gallery of Rome and the Near East, and the Galleries of Africa: Nubia.



Jar with a menorah

Several Jewish objects from ancient Palestine are exhibited in the Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Gallery of Byzantium – a jar with a menorah, a ring with a menorah, etrog and lulav and a bread stamp with a menorah and cross.

They date back to the period from 300 to 614 CE.

The jar and the ring were most likely made for Jews visiting holy sites in Jerusalem.

The bread stamp engraved with a menorah and a cross is extremely rare because the portrayal of images was considered idolatrous, said Paul Denis, the assistant curator of the Greek and Roman collections.

In general, the Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Gallery of Byzantium contains an array of jewelry, religious objects, church frescoes, glasswork, coins and a floor mosaic.

The museum claims that the single most important artifact in the gallery, which focuses on both Palestine and Syria, is an Early Byzantine ciborium, or church altar canopy, dating from around 500 to 600 CE.

The Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Gallery of Rome and the Near East examines Rome's expansion further east during the Republic and Imperial eras and features carved tomb reliefs from Palmyra, wall paintings from the Syrian and Lebanese coasts, jewelry from Rome, coins minted in Antioch and eastern Mediterranean floor mosaics.

The Tanenbaums, a Toronto family, have donated more than 2,000 artifacts and antiquities from the Middle East, China and Europe to the museum in the past 15 years. They are valued at about $90 million.

On view at the Eaton Gallery of Rome are over 500 pieces from the museum's holdings of classical antiquities, the largest in Canada. Among the objects are portrait sculpture, ceramics and military weapons.

Within the Eaton gallery is The Bratty Exhibit of Etruria. It focuses on Etruscan civilization, which peaked in Italy from about 550 BCE to 509 CE.

The Galleries of Africa: Nubia trace the history of Nubia from about 4500 BCE to 1323 CE and showcase its culture and religion.

The federal government committed $2.75 million to the new galleries, said Minister of Transport, Infrastructure and Communities Denis Lebel.

"It's a great investment in our future," he noted. "The Royal Ontario Museum is an artistic and historical gem that enriches the Toronto area with its dynamic exhibits and distinguished galleries."

Canadian filmmakers visit Israel

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Sidney Greenberg, vice-president of the Canadian media giant Astral Media Inc., took a group of eight Canadian filmmakers to the Jerusalem Film Festival last week as a means of marking the 50th anniversary of the company's origins as a film lab in Montreal in 1961.

"This is the first time we've had a mission going to Israel," said Greenberg, who with his late brother Harold Greenberg began an extensive and nurturing involvement in the Israeli film industry some 40 years ago.

In a conversation with The CJN, Greenberg recalled the early days of Israel's movie industry when all productions were in black and white, editors feared scratching negatives in crude editing machines, and the walls of sound studios were acoustically lined with straw.

Astral sponsored the Canadian filmmakers' visit to Israel through its Harold Greenberg Fund, which has poured about $73 million into the development of Canadian dramatic feature films in the past quarter century.

The filmmakers' trip was also partially underwritten by the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs Cultural Division, and coordinated with the assistance of the Israeli Consulate in Toronto. "We're very happy about it," said Amir Gissin, the consul general. "This is the first time that we see such a trip that means business."

A bilateral film treaty between Canada and Israel, which the Greenbergs helped spur into existence some 20 years ago, encourages joint cinematic ventures between the two countries with tax and other incentives. "If I want to make a movie and shoot it here and in Israel, I can write it off as a Canadian production," Greenberg explained.

While in Israel, the Canadian filmmakers are expected to meet with Israeli and other industry colleagues to discuss potential joint projects. They will also tour the Sam Spiegel Film and Television School, meet with officials of the Jerusalem Film Fund and tour production studios in Tel Aviv, among other activities.

"For us, the most important thing is to see things happening – to get the product, to get Canadian and Israeli directors and producers working together," Gissin said.

The filmmakers invited on the trip were Jennifer Jonas of New Real Films, Damon D'Oliveria of Conquering Lion Productions, Julia Rosenberg of January Films, Corey Marr of Corey Marr Productions, Tony Wosk of Middle Child Films, David Miller of Agency 71, and independents Paul Barkin and Ina Fichman.

"I'm really excited to be going," said Toronto film producer Barkin. "I really think there's a lot of great stories to be told out of Israel and between Israel and Canadians, whether we shoot in Israel or whether we shoot in Canada. I think there are stories that both parties can benefit from."

EYE ON ARTS

By BILL GLADSTONE

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART I: THE STRANGE CASE OF BEN HECHT

Eighty years ago, in June 1931, New York publisher Covici Friede announced that A Jew in Love, a new novel by Ben Hecht (1894-1964), had been banned in Canada and in bookstores in Boston and other American cities.

Anyone who opened the book – the front page of which described the Jewish protagonist as "a dark-skinned little Jew with a vulturous and moody face" – might reasonably have concluded that its many antisemitic caricatures were its main objectionable feature. Not so: it was Hecht's heretical utterance that "God is a pain in the ass" that sparked the various regional bans. (The last three words of the offending phrase were removed from subsequent editions.)

Ben Hecht

Despite the controversy and the book's low artistic merit, A Jew in Love quickly sold 50,000 copies and made the bestseller lists of 1931, even as Jewish leaders across America denounced Hecht as a "self-hating Jew." He likewise drew their ire for making public pronouncements that ridiculed American Zionists for "raising nickels for a lot of God damn stinking Jews in Palestine."

Yet, strange as it sounds, the prolific writer and scriptwriter underwent a remarkable reversal over the next decade to become one of America's most effective public defenders of the Jewish people and Jewish statehood.

Born to Russian-Jewish parents in New York, Hecht grew up in the Midwest and became a newspaper columnist for a large Chicago daily. His first novel, Erik Dorn (1921), drew favourable reviews and was a bestseller. He wrote at lightning speed and once won a $2,500 bet by composing a publishable novel in less than two days with the help of amanuenses. Attracted by the bright lights of Hollywood, Hecht's ability to craft a good screenplay in only four to six weeks put him much in demand, especially after the proven popularity of his play-turned-motion picture, The Front Page, co-written with Charles MacArthur and later remade as His Girl Friday.

Hecht once observed that he "turned into a Jew in 1939," just as the world was digging in for a protracted war. The reason, as he explained in his memoir A Child of the Century, was that he "bumped into history" and discovered his own Jewish identity. That same year, between his work on Gunga Din, Wuthering Heights, Stagecoach and his uncredited polishing of dialogue in Gone with the Wind, he wrote the script for Let Freedom Ring, a patriotic movie promoting American democracy and the need for American intervention in Europe.

The rise of German antisemitism triggered a "Theodor Herzl moment" in Hecht, which led to "his own reawakening as a proud, mobilized Jew," McGill professor Gil Troy observed in a 2003 article. "Nazism offended Hecht personally. He fought back with the zeal of a convert and the indignation of a disturbed hermit." In one typical article, My Tribe Is Called Israel, Hecht addressed American Jews who felt detached from Judaism to rise up to defend the Jewish people against the Nazis onslaught.

In 1943, he wrote We Will Never Die, a stage pageant that celebrated the Jewish contribution to civilization. In a 1944 book, A Guide for the Bedevilled, he outlined his own career as a lapsed and then reborn Jew, keen on a mission to write about Jews and antisemitism – a task "that elates me more than any task to which I ever have set myself."

In 1946 came A Flag Is Born, which promoted the establishment of a Jewish state. It featured the music of Kurt Weill and a cast that included Paul Muni, Celia Adler and a young unknown actor, Marlon Brando. The production raised a million dollars for the militant Jewish organization Irgun, a portion of which went to purchase a ship, the SS Ben Hecht, to bring Jewish refugees to Palestine. (The British boarded it and redirected it to Cyprus.)

Once a zealous denigrator of Jews, Hecht now became even more zealous in their defence. But when he placed a series of ads in major newspapers congratulating the Irgun for blowing up British trains in Palestine, he drew an angry response. "There was nearly unanimous agreement that this time Hecht had gone too far," Toronto author Doug Fetherling wrote in his 1977 book, The Five Lives of Ben Hecht. "The Zionists only grew angrier, and many of Hecht's friends dropped away." Hecht was blacklisted by cinema owners who refused to show any films with his name in the credits. From that moment forward, Hecht's brilliant career went into a steep decline from which it never recovered. Undaunted, he raised the money for the Altalena, an Irgun ship that the Israel Defence Forces destroyed in Tel Aviv harbour in June 1948 during the War of Independence.

Hecht has always been hard to pigeonhole because of his ability to jump media from newspapers to novels to stageplays to screenplays to propaganda for militant Zionism. Although he left behind a remarkable trail of credits that included several Hitchcock films (Spellbound, Notorious) and other Hollywood classics, his quick-witted brain ultimately served to bring him a measure of discredit as well.

Moscow-born soccer player to represent Canada

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

York University Lions soccer player Ilya Orlov has spent so much time travelling and moving he may as well live out of his suitcase.

Born in Moscow, Orlov moved to Tel Aviv with his family when he was two years old.

In 1995, he came to Canada and lived in Montreal and Toronto. Today, he calls Woodbridge, Ont., home, but next month he's heading for the southern Chinese coastal community of Shenzhen, a short train ride from Hong Kong, to participate in an international soccer tournament.

Orlov doesn't speak Chinese, but he doesn't have to.

The 22-year old, quite agile on his feet with the ability to show bursts of speed, hopes his athletic talent will do the talking at the 26th Summer Universiade, an international multi-sport event organized for university athletes from 20 countries.

Steve Hart, the Canadian team's head coach, wasted little time adding his name to the 20-man playing roster.

Orlov is that good.

He was a midfielder for the York Lions squad that compiled a 17-3-2 record this past season – one that culminated with a 1-0 win over the University of British Columbia Thunderbirds for the Canadian Interuniversity Sport (CIS) national championship.

Orlov was also a first team university all-star in his rookie year.

"I take soccer seriously – everything else in my life stops when I'm playing," said Orlov, who was first exposed to the game at the age of four when his father kicked a ball around with him on a concrete surface in Tel Aviv.

"That's what kids do in Israel – it's all soccer."

Orlov is so dedicated to the sport that he didn't hesitate to come up with the $3,000 it costs each player to travel with the team to China.

"Some people think it's embarrassing that you're representing Canada at an international competition and still have to pay," Orlov said.

"But there was a choice: you go or don't go. I was very fortunate to find a friend who agreed to sponsor me and I can hardly wait to get there and start playing."

Orlov added that the trip to China is a once in a lifetime opportunity.

"To be picked to play for Canada – a real thrill," said Orlov, who admitted his room at home resembles a soccer library loaded with his medals, trophies, books and pictures.

Orlov, who currently plays in the Canadian Soccer League, has played in the past with the Ontario Soccer League's Woodbridge Azzurri and with Maccabi Toronto in the Downsview Park Adult Soccer League. He also trained with Maccabi Bat-Yam when he visited Israel with his family.

Ilya Orlov

Orlov's role on the soccer field – keeping opposing snipers from scoring – can take its toll.

He once suffered a broken nose during a semi-final game against Ryerson University when an opposing player accidentally kicked Orlov in the face.

Four years ago, he thought his soccer career was in jeopardy when he broke his ankle prior to the start of the Ontario Colleges season.

Now Orlov is faced with the challenge of winning a few games in Shenzhen at the competition, also known as the World University Games.

Canada will compete in a pool against the Japanese – they won a bronze medal last year – the Ghanese and the British. The Ukrainians, who beat Canada two years ago, are this year's defending champs.

Orlov's coach, Hart, had nothing but praise for one of his best players.

"He's cool, calm, collected, but also very smart with the soccer ball," said Hart, who also coaches the University of Windsor's soccer team.

Hart, who was on the losing end of two shutout games against York last season, is counting on Orlov to help the Canadians win at the tournament in Shenzhen.

"[Orlov] is very talented and dominant on the field – just no other way to explain him. When I say he's like my quarterback, that should tell you he's one of my biggest assets," Hart said.

"We're not going there to tour. The expectations are high, but I also think very realistic."

In six previous appearances at these games, Canada's best performance came in 2007 when they finished fourth.

Although Orlov is currently focused on winning the tournament, he isn't ignoring his academic future.

Working towards a career to fall back on, Orlov initially pursued a two-year paralegal studies program at Humber College several years ago – during which he played soccer for the school team – but today, Orlov is hoping to pursue a career that can be combined with his love of the "beautiful game."

The York student is studying kinesiology in the hope that he will be able to use his expertise to become a professional soccer coach.

Casspi traded to Cleveland Cavaliers

JTA

SACRAMENTO — Omri Casspi, the first Israeli to play in the NBA, has been traded to the Cleveland Cavaliers.

The Sacramento Kings sent Casspi, 23, and a 2012 first-round draft pick to the Cavs in exchange for power forward J.J. Hickson.

Casspi, a favourite of Jewish fans across the country, had expressed a desire to be traded because he believed he was not getting enough playing time.

Both six-foot-nine inch forwards were number one draft picks by their original teams: Casspi in 2009 and Hickson the previous year out of North Carolina State.

In the 2010-11 season, Casspi averaged 8.6 points and 4.3 rebounds playing 24 minutes a game, mostly as a reserve. His playing time diminished as the season progressed.

Hickson averaged 13.8 points and 8.7 rebounds, mostly as a starter.

Casspi is training to play with the Israeli national team in the European basketball championships in August.

The day of the trade, NBA owners told representatives of the National Basketball Players Association that they will be instituting a lockout after the two sides failed to work out a new collective bargaining agreement.

Top Egyptian politician calls Holocaust, 9/11 fabrications

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The vice-chairman of Egypt's top secular party told the Washington Times in an interview last week that the Sept. 11 terror attacks, the Holocaust and Anne Frank's diary are all historical fabrications.

"The Holocaust is a lie," Ahmed Ezz El-Arab, Wafd party leader told the newspaper when he was in Budapest, where he was attending the Conference on Democracy and Human Rights.

He went on to explain that it was factually impossible to claim that the Nazis killed six million Jews, saying, "The Jews under German occupation were 2.4 million. So if they were all exterminated, where does the remaining 3.6 million come from?"

The Egyptian politician acknowledged that the Nazis may have killed "hundreds of thousands" of Jews, but discounted the plausibility of gas chambers and skinning Jews alive, calling them "fanciful stories."

El-Arab's Holocaust denial did not stop there, and the Egyptian politician went on to attack the authenticity of Anne Frank's diary, the memoirs of a teenage girl who hid from the Nazis in Amsterdam, only to be discovered and die in a concentration camp.

The Wafd leader recalled studying the novel, one of the most widely distributed publications to date, when he was a doctoral student in Stockholm. "I could swear to God it's a fake," he said. "The girl was there, but the memoirs are a fake."

Ahmed Ezz El-Arab

El-Arab concurred with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's denial of the Holocaust – but discredited his motives.

"He's a hateful character, so whatever he says can be criticized," he told the Washington Times, adding that "what he says about the Holocaust is true, but he doesn't say it because it's true. He says it out of hatred to the Israeli state."

When asked about future peace with Israel, El-Arab attempted to assuage fears that a new Egyptian government would cancel the 1979 treaty.

The Egyptian politician told the newspaper that there is "no chance at all" that would happen," adding, "Egypt will not go to war unless it's attacked."

El-Arab's historical revision was not reserved for the Holocaust alone, and he also shared his theories on the Sept. 11 attacks and their perpetrators with the Washington Times.

The Wafd leader denied that Osama bin Laden, the Al Qaeda leader who was recently killed in an American raid on his compound in Pakistan, was behind the attacks.

"He could not have the know-how or the ability to do it," El-Arab said, calling the dead Al Qaeda leader "an American agent."

The Egyptian politician added, "If he had the ability, one plane only landing on the Knesset would give more effect."

El-Arab blamed the CIA, Israel's Mossad and the "military-industrial complex" for 9-11.

Despite his Holocaust-denying views, it seems as though El-Arab's overall opinion of the Jewish people is favourable. He told the Washington Times that he believes that there was once a Jewish temple in Jerusalem, entitling the Jews to a historical claim on Israel's capital.

"The Jews are there," he said. "Good or bad, they are there." However, he made sure to follow up with the clarification: "You cannot as a human being think of exterminating six million or five million or whatever. That's crazy."

Dutch shchitah ban concerns Jews

Alex Weisler
JTA

AMSTERDAM — A few streets over from the bookstore where Anne Frank bought her famous diary, the only kosher butcher shop in Holland is bustling. Two employees man the long counter at Slagerij Marcus, pausing from chopping meat to sell customers a bit of this or that for Shabbat dinner.

In the wake of an overwhelming vote by the Dutch House of Representatives to ban the type of ritual slaughter required for kosher and halal meat, this butcher shop famous for its handmade sausage is at the front lines of a battle between two competing ideals in Holland: freedom of religion and animal welfare.

What put shchitah, or kosher slaughter, in the crosshairs was an unlikely convergence between animal rights activists and Holland's far-right, anti-Muslim movement.

The Party for the Animals is interested in banning all forms of what it considers inhumane slaughter, while the Freedom Party led by firebrand Geert Wilders is interested in making Holland inhospitable to Muslims. For Wilders, who in 2009 called Islam "the ideology of a retarded culture," the impact on shchitah is collateral damage.

"It's a shift from the Netherlands as an open society to the Netherlands as a closed, monocultural society," said Joel Erwteman, a Jewish lawyer who helped Dutch Jewish leaders draft a position paper opposing the slaughter bill. "It's becoming completely normal to talk about Muslims as being a problem."

Kosher slaughter seems secure for now – the Parliament is on recess until September, and approval by the Dutch Senate, a key step for the measure to become law, is no guarantee.

If the ban does pass, Jewish leaders plan to challenge it in court, arguing that the guarantee of freedom of religion enshrined in the European Convention on Human Rights precludes banning shchitah. The law also could be amended to make an exception for kosher slaughter if it can be proven that no additional harm is caused to animals by killing them the kosher way.

And if that fails, Dutch Jews easily could procure kosher meat by importing it legally from nearby countries.

But for many Jews in the country, the most disconcerting element of the drive to outlaw shchitah isn't so much the legality of kosher slaughter per se but the symbolism of Holland's move to outlaw a basic element of Jewish life. It's a sign, some say, that after 400 years of a Jewish presence in the Netherlands, the traditions of the country's approximately 40,000 Jews count for little.

Trip to India not for faint of heart

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

They suffered through stifling 48-degree heat, maniacal speed-demon bus drivers, aggressive monkeys and even a head-butting incident with a stray cow.

A six-week trip to India may not be for the faint of heart, but for students Dayna Simon and Adrienne Silver, it was an experience of a lifetime.

"Going to India is something I've always wanted to do," said Silver, 22, who recently graduated from the University of Western Ontario's communications program. "I've always been really interested in the culture."

Simon, 22, a University of Toronto graduate student and Hillel of Greater Toronto's graduate representative, said that while it's trendy for some to travel to India to "to find themselves" spiritually, she and her friend – both active members of the Toronto Jewish community – "just wanted to explore a different world."

A different world is exactly what they got, and it didn't take long for the girls to experience a culture shock.

"We flew Air India, so when we got on the plane, we were already in culture shock. We were the only white people on the flight," Simon said.

"The first morning in India we woke up and went outside and it was probably 48 degrees plus humidity, and the men weren't wearing pants, they were just wearing loincloths because it was so hot. You wake up and you just look outside... and there are cows walking in the streets."

The shock, they suspected, went both ways.

Silver explained that when they travelled to the poorer areas of the country that were off the beaten path, "people would stare at us, and it was kind of a shock for them."

"American culture hasn't really infiltrated the south yet as it has in other areas," Simon added. "When they saw two white girls not wearing saris, wearing shorts and T-shirts, we got a lot of funny looks, whereas in other places, people would stop and take pictures."

Although Simon admitted that throughout the six-week adventure she never fully overcame her culture shock, Silver said she was far more at ease.

"I was pretty comfortable with the culture, and I felt like I connected with it a lot," said Silver, who has ventured into the unknown before, on a volunteer trip to Thailand.

"I was trying to connect with the culture and the mentality and the customs. It's about not looking at the culture from the outside in, it's about engaging with the culture," Silver said.

Simon and Silver made the most of their time in India, having visited one of the seven wonders of the world, the Taj Mahal, river rafted in Rishikesh, rode an elephant at the Periyar National Park, and taken a four-day trek on the peaks of Nanda Devi.

They documented their adventures on a blog called Two Girls One Trip (www.daynaandadrienne.blogspot.com), updating their family and friends about everything they saw and experienced.

One of their blog posts described their visit to an area in New Delhi called Pahar Ganj – or as Silver liked to call it, Little Israel.

"Pahar Ganj... has been established as the hot spot for Israeli backpackers in Delhi. It was hilarious to see how big of an influence Israeli tourists have had on the neighbourhood. Store signs all over the area were mainly written in English, Hindi and Hebrew. Some stores even offered their prices in shekels," Silver wrote in her blog.

Silver said the area was so heavily populated by Israelis, that some of the locals learned to speak Hebrew to communicate with the Israeli visitors.

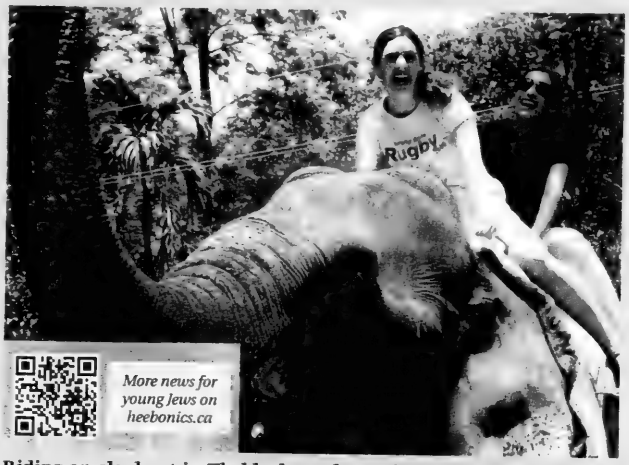
"The first time an Indian approached us in fluent Hebrew, Ade and I were shocked," Simon said.

But this isn't the only connection India has with Judaism, which Silver and Simon learned more about when they visited Cochin, in part to fill their "Jewish tourist quota."

Cochin is home to a neighbourhood called Jew Town (yes, Jew Town), where travellers can find the Paradesi Synagogue, at the corner of Synagogue Lane and Jew Street.

The Paradesi shul, built in 1568 when Jewish spice traders set up businesses in the area, is one of eight synagogues in Cochin, but the only one still functioning. The synagogue, now a protected heritage site, still serves as a place of worship for the 13-member Jewish community.

Simon, who said they spent their first Shabbat with the Chabad centre in Cochin and prayed at the Paradesi shul, described the temple as "embellished," with bright colours – gold, red and orange – intricate Indian chandeliers, and mosaic tiles that were imported from China in the 16th century.



Riding an elephant in Thekkady at the Periyar National Park is just one of the many adventures Dayna Simon, front, and Adrienne Silver experienced during their six-week trip to India this summer.

"Once upon a time there was a thriving community of Jews here," Simon said.

At its peak, the Jewish community in India, who claimed to be descendants of the Bene Israel tribe, reached about 20,000 in 1948.

Following Israel's independence, most immigrated to the Jewish state. In 1964, the Israeli rabbinate recognized the Indian Jews as ethnically Jewish, and by the 1970s, all but a few families immigrated to Israel, where the Cochin Jewish community makes up about 8,000.

During their visit to the shul, Simon and Silver were invited by a Jewish family to join them for Shabbat dinner.

"It was really shocking that they don't eat chicken soup and challah," Simon said with a laugh.

"They adopted the Malayalam culture. They wear saris and they eat Indian food, yet they're white and Jewish," Silver said.

While they pray in Hebrew, they speak a language called Judeo-Malayalam, a dialect that mixes Hindi, Tamil, Malayalam and Hebrew.

Simon said that while their customs have been influenced by Indian culture, she was still able to relate to the Cochin Jews based on the many similarities.

For example, Indian Jews bless the chapatti, an Indian flatbread, rather than a braided challah, but it is still covered with a traditional challah cover during the Kiddush.

"What is interesting about this community is that it still has so much in common with our Jewish community," Simon said.

"We still all celebrate Shabbat and we still say 'shalom aleichem,' and we have that in common. They may not eat the same Shabbat dinner that I eat, maybe there's no gefilte fish, but they are still eating Shabbat dinner."

While both Silver and Simon insisted that their Indian adventure wasn't motivated by any need to fill some kind of spiritual void, Silver said she "appreciated the spirituality there.

"We were trying to understand how in a country of more than one billion people how people manage to stay so kind and hospitable and friendly. There are impoverished places all over India, and how do they stay so positive all the time? It must be something to do with spirituality," Silver said.

Although Silver and Simon said that their trip to India was an experience they'll never forget, Simon warned, "you have to be adventurous and you have to want to step out of your comfort zone."

"But I would suggest venturing out of the Jewish bubble," Silver added.

Advice for single male readers

Last time we met, I promised you, my dear single male readers, some tips on how and where to get the woman of your dreams. So, here goes.

If you're after a beauty queen: well, my friend, it'd be way easier if you were a handsome Jewish doctor. If you're not, when you spot your queen (so she won the 1973 contest, so what?), don't give her a second look! Ignore her completely, or drop some snooty looks in her direction. It will drive her crazy ("Why? Why isn't he hitting on me already!").

When you're in a restaurant, she'll probably order a lettuce salad. Never say: "Is that all you're eating?" Instead, order cheesecake and say: "Sorry, can't let you have a taste. By your last photos, I noticed someone has been a little gluttonous lately, hasn't she?" She'll fall into your arms in a heartbeat.

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

Tell her how much you see her inner beauty and don't overdo the compliments. If you say: "Gee, you're so gorgeous, I've never thought I'd go on a date with someone like you," she'll figure you probably know what you're talking about.

Next, how to get your dream woman at the supermarket. Never approach a woman who stands at the diaper and formula shelves. She's probably not buying for her cousin's neighbour's baby.

Do stop next to a woman looking at aftershave and try some on. Gaze at her with an embarrassed smile and ask for her opinion. Take her recommendation (beware – you are not to talk to a sales clerk!) and put her choice in your cart. The gesture will move her, and if she's available, you have a shot.

If taking her advice doesn't make an impression on her and she walks away, return the smelly bottle to the shelf. There's no need to stick with some stupid lady's choice!

Girls you should stay away from: if your new girl won't let you see her pictures from elementary school, study her nose, examine her hair roots and curves, then think again (especially if you want to be the father of a beautiful girl someday).

If she yawns whenever you talk about your precious mom, dear father and devoted big sisters, yet gets all excited when you mention your grandpa's will, stay away!

If your mom can't stand her, don't even bother. She's not, and will never be, the one.

If everywhere the two of you go, at least one guy knows her, hugs her warmly, and asks her if, by any chance, she found his lighter, pen or undershirt, let's assume it's not because she's the head of the lost and found division.

And in general – if she says she loves you, she really needs you to say you love her, too. Remember that – and you're good to go.

Enjoy summer's plenty now

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

Every year, I wait for summer when my favourite vegetables sweeten, ripen and make their debut in produce sections, farmers markets and my own backyard. There's nothing like the melange of fragrances that result. I don't even mind my eyes watering from the acrid pungency of onions, chili peppers and garlic.

For me it harkens back to my youth when my mother populated our yard with her Victory Garden – one whiff and I am six years old, stuffing mud-layered tomatoes, scallions and basil into my mouth, while visions of delicious dinners danced in my head.

The diversity is mind-boggling. The veggies also change colours before our very eyes. Through crossbreeding and hybridizing, we have white eggplant, orange and yellow tomatoes, yellow zucchini, green cauliflower, purple bell peppers and asparagus.

Using vegetables in season yields the best quality, the biggest variety, the sweetest taste, and also the best price. It's odd that we actually pay more later for vegetables that have been in cold storage for months.

In summertime, when the living is supposed to be easy, our cooking chores are simplified because we can depend on the robust flavours of our vegetables. Summer is also the best time to eat our veggies raw, preserving all the vitamins and minerals depleted by cooking. Try carrot, celery and jicama sticks, zucchini rounds, half moons of bell pepper, florets of broccoli and cauliflower, mushroom buttons.

Savoury salsas, creamy guacamole and veggie kabobs are also better this time of year. Crisp, crunchy raw veggies can be enhanced with creamy dips seasoned with fresh herbs, nuts, olives or pimientos. A wonderful combination is cream cheese or yogurt flavoured with ripe olives, chives, spinach, mushrooms and hazelnuts. Make a hot cheddar cheese dip with chili peppers, garlic, cilantro and tomatoes. Or serve your tomatoes ice cold, atop some white mozzarella, fresh basil and a drizzle of olive oil.

Since my favourite dishes, including pasta with pesto and tomato bruschetta, are different combinations of tomatoes, sweet onions, garlic and basil, I have decided to offer a new favourite featuring "summer's big four" to their best advantage. See if you agree.

FRESH VEGETABLE PASTA

This dish makes a gorgeous presentation. Everything should be finished at the same time, so that you can place it artfully on your platter and serve it immediately.

1 large, sweet onion, chopped fine
3 cloves fresh garlic, diced
olive oil for frying
1 yellow bell pepper, sliced thin
1 large, ripe tomato, peeled, seeded and chopped fine
2 oz. black olives, sliced
1/2 lb. mushrooms, sliced
1/4 cup fresh basil, sliced
1/4 cup fresh parsley, chopped fine
1/4 cup white wine
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1/2 cup freshly grated Parmesan cheese
1/2 to 1 lb. linguine

Sauté onion and garlic in olive oil until translucent, about 3 to 5 minutes. Add pepper and tomato and cook another 3 minutes, until softened. Add olives, mushrooms, basil, parsley and wine; simmer 3 more minutes until flavours are blended. Add salt and pepper. Reserve; cover to keep warm.

Put 8 ounces of linguine into large pot of boiling water with 1 tsp. olive oil, and 1 tsp. salt. Cook 6-8 minutes, al dente. Drain in colander. Toss pasta with vegetable sauce. Sprinkle with additional parsley, basil and Parmesan.

Israeli invention gives 'sight' to blind

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Within days of exhibiting its "virtual cane" device for the blind, Hebrew University scientists grabbed headlines for a little gadget about to change the lives of millions of people across the globe.

It's dubbed "Yes-Eye-Cane," and it's meant to replace the traditional white cane used by the sight-impaired population for getting around. It was developed by Dr. Amir Amedi – of Hebrew U's Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem – and his team to improve orientation and mobility of the sight-impaired by helping them estimate the distance and height of obstacles in their path.

"It enables the detection of obstacles that are much farther away than the one-metre radius of the regular white cane," Dr. Daniel-Robert Chebat, who works in Amedi's laboratory for multisensory research at Hebrew U, told The CJN. "The user does not need to actually touch an object with a stick to feel it. The sensors of the device do this instead. This device is much more discreet and avoids clumsily hitting objects with a stick to sense their presence."

A peal from the past

JTA

JERUSALEM — A small Second Temple-era bell, possibly like those worn on the clothes of the high priests, was unearthed in Jerusalem.

Archeologists discovered the golden artifact during excavations in a drainage channel that begins in the Shiloah Pool and runs through the City of David toward the Western Wall, the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) said on Sunday.

The dig leaders, Eli Shukron and Ronny Reich of Haifa University, said the bell, which has a small loop at its tip, was probably sewn on to the garment of a senior Jerusalem official in the first century, and may have fallen off into the drainage ditch.

"It is impossible to know for certain if the bell did indeed belong to one of the high priests. However, the possibility should not be entirely discounted," the IAA said in a statement.

It quoted a description, in Exodus, of the robe worn by Aaron the priest: "All of blue... it shall have a binding of woven work... And upon the skirts of it thou shalt make pomegranates of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, round about the skirts thereof; and bells of gold between them round about."

UJA Supports South Sudan

The Canadian Jewish community is joining others around the world by helping the fledgling country of South Sudan, which became a nation on July 9 after a vote for independence.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and IsraAID: The Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid, in partnership with the American Jewish Committee and the government of Sudan, last week sent a humanitarian aid shipment to the beleaguered country.

The federation provided funding to IsraAID for the shipment, whose cargo was comprised of medicine, food and potable water.

The shipment was put together "on behalf of the Israeli and Jewish people as a goodwill gesture between both communities," according to a news release issued by the federation.

Israel recognized South Sudan on July 10.

Toronto-based humanitarian and relief organization Ve'ahavta, also plans to contact its partners on the ground in Sudan to "explore options to join efforts and deliver service for the Sudanese in the future," a spokesperson for the organization said.

Cdn Volunteer Awards

Canadians are being encouraged to flag the government about people they think are making a difference in their communities.

On July 12, Diane Finley, minister of human resources and skills development Canada (HRSDC), announced that the nomination period is now open for the Prime Minister's Volunteer Awards.

The awards will recognize individuals or groups of volunteers, businesses and not-for-profit organizations in five regions across Canada, and will offer a national award in two categories: one for lifelong achievement and one for new volunteers, according to Finley's office.

Nominations will be accepted until Sept. 9, 2011.

Canadians can visit www.pm.gc.ca/awards for more information on the awards program, eligibility criteria and the nomination process.

Mengele Diaries Sold

Infamous Nazi doctor Josef Mengele's diaries were auctioned off last week to a haredi American man for $245,000.

The man, whose name was not disclosed by the auction house, is apparently an avid collector of artifacts from World War II.

Known as the "Angel of Death," Mengele was one of the most gruesome war criminals of the Holocaust, blamed for tens of thousands of deaths in his role as concentration camp doctor.

His diaries, a total of 31 ring notebooks containing some 3,400 pages of handwritten notes, were sold at Alexander Historical Auctions in Stamford, Connecticut, north of New York City despite the objections of Holocaust survivors and historians.

Body of Nazi leader Rudolf Hess exhumed

On July 20, the remains of Nazi leader Rudolf Hess were exhumed from his grave in Germany after it became a pilgrimage site for neo-Nazis.

His body was taken from his grave in Wunsiedel, Germany and the headstone removed. The body will be cremated and its ashes scattered at sea.

Hess served as Adolf Hitler's deputy and personal secretary.

Hundreds of Nazis marched each year on Wunsiedel in honour of Hess on the anniversary of his death. The practice was banned in 2005.

Rudolf Hess

Hess was put on trial at Nuremburg, where he was given a life sentence for crimes against peace and conspiracy to commit crimes. He was sent to the Spandau prison in Berlin and committed suicide there in 1987 at age 93.

Downtown shul gets a one-day makeover

The latest in a series of 'Lend a Hand' projects

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

On a sunny Sunday in July, the last place you'd expect a group of unaffiliated young Jews is an 80-year-old downtown synagogue.

But, coated in plaster, dust and paint, wielding power tools and baby wipes, a group of about 40 volunteers from The House showed up at the Anshei Minsk Synagogue on July 10 for the Minsk Makeover.

The House, a second-floor storefront on Eglinton Avenue West, was launched by Rabbi Rafi Lipner in 2005 as a non-threatening environment where 18 to 30-year-old Jews can, according to its website, "kick back, chat, think, experience, relax and explore" their Judaism.

The Minsk Makeover is the latest in a series of "Lend a Hand" projects, like last winter's Latkes for Chessed, led by 32-year-old Coby Segall, a group leader in research and innovation for tech firm Psion Teklogix.

Segall says the projects, which happen about every six weeks, provide "an opportunity to collaborate with some incredible individuals" including other community organizations like DANI, Jewish Family & Child and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue's Out of the Cold program on "projects nobody else is doing."

Volunteers Rabbi Ariel Tal and Julia Segal sand the women's balcony railing. [Jennifer M. MacLeod photos]

Segall's wife, Robyn, who also came down to paint railings at the Minsk, is marketing, communications and public relations manager for Ve'ahavta.

The Finkler Question

From the editor's desk...

British novelist, journalist and broadcaster Howard Jacobson is exceptionally talented. He is also principled and fearless. He is unbowed when speaking his conscience and holds firm and resolute to the rock of his beliefs in the face of popular howling winds.

Last month, he stood in the ring of public opinion against iconic American writer Alice Walker and forcefully countered her pretentious public display of participating in the celebrated flotilla effort to break the Israeli naval blockade of Gaza.

"Whatever its cargo," Jacobson wrote on CNN's website, "by luring the Israeli military into action which can be represented as brutal, the flotilla is engaged in an entirely political act. To call it by any other name is the grossest hypocrisy."

Walker had earlier explained her participation in the flotilla on the CNN website as a way of striving for "justice and respect" for Palestinian children. "One child must never be set above another," she wrote.

But Jacobson did not demur.

He responded to Walker directly by reminding her of the fundamental facts that she and most Israel-bashers inexplicably ignore: "Gaza is under siege, Israelis will tell you, because weapons are fired from it into Israel, threatening the lives of Israeli children." He then added, "If the aim of the flotilla is to ensure that one child will not be set above another, it is hard to see how challenging the blockade will achieve it. All an Israeli parent will see is a highly charged emotionalism disguising an action that, by its very partiality, chooses the Palestinian child over the Israeli."

On account of his superior skills, Jacobson is now also a prize-winning writer.

In October 2010, he received Britain's prestigious Man Booker Prize for Fiction for his audacious novel, The Finkler Question, a bold, in-your-face story that deals head-on with issues of antisemitism, Jewish identity and Israel.

The particular setting of Jacobson's tale is London, England. And although the details of the story are richly and uniquely depictive of modern British society, the issues he explores have a much wider application. Alas.

It is for this reason, of course – the deeply disturbing re-emergence above the surface of polite society of shockingly widespread antisemitism – that Jacobson undertook to apply his literary abilities to this very serious subject matter. And it is for this reason the book, like a beckoning siren in our troubled times, calls to us to observe, study and weigh his insights.

And Jacobson's insights are worth the measure.

That he conveys them in the form of a work of fiction is itself a testament to his strong character and abiding confidence. And that the work is infused with humour testifies to his robust, unflinching imagination.

The very name of the novel, The Finkler Question, suggests the writer's clever but purposeful entry into painful sociological territory.

The name Finkler is that of Sam Finkler, one of the key characters in the story, a pop-culture philosopher, television celebrity. We are told early on by another of the key players, Julian Treslove, that to him, the name Finkler is an eponymous stand-in for all Jews, for Jewish.

Thus, The Finkler Question, is intended to be read as "The Jewish Question," the very same articulation of the very question that has inspired the debate conducted through the ages by philo and anti-semites alike: What to do with their society's Jews? Do they belong?

Through the complex literary weave of his novel, Jacobson ties together that discussion in the friendships of the story's three core characters, Finkler, Treslove and Libor Sevcik, and the influential handful of peripheral characters.

The story is difficult and painful to read, and at times not very pleasant, because the issues themselves are difficult, painful and unpleasant. Jacobson spares no feelings among his characters or of the reader. He gives voice to the vilest racism of the thugs, the worst ignorance of the ignoramuses, and the most strident anti-Israel bashing of elitish, "intellectual" Jews.

He writes as an insider, with nuance and understanding, indignation and reserve about the worry felt by most Jews at the ugly resurgence of antisemitism.

Despite its humour, the story is dark and often brooding. It is more tragi-comedy than comedy. The Finkler Question is a reminder of the medieval polemic that always spelled trouble for the Jews.

Jacobson is a gifted writer who urges us not to be cowed by or knuckle under to the medieval polemicists of today.

PROTESTING HIGH HOUSING PRICES

A young man in Jerusalem stands atop a statue near a protesters' camp established to demonstrate against the high cost of housing in Israel's major cities, which makes it especially difficult for young couples to get into the housing market. The sign on the statue reads "We are fighting for homes." Similar protests have sprung up in cities across Israel in recent weeks.

"8% return paid monthly. Consistent. Redeemable. Over $80 million invested in real estate and growing. RSP, RIF and TFSA eligible."

Everyone in the community is abuzz at this investment opportunity from OWEMANCO Mortgage Trust – especially during these uncertain times.

Talking about this and other matters is Jonah Bonn, Chief Operating Officer, OWEMANCO

Of late, many accredited investors have been talking about how investing in OWEMANCO Mortgage Trust makes tremendous money sense, particularly during these unpredictable and uncertain times. Can you tell us how?

Very simply, we are a hedge against uncertain times.

OWEMANCO Mortgage Trust, which is managed and administered by Ontario Wealth Management Corporation (OWEMANCO), is a real estate backed fund with a conservative portfolio of first mortgages secured by 'real' property, primarily in Ontario.

Our main goal is safeguarding the principal, while maximizing the return. In fact, our portfolio is growing and is now over $80 million.

I am very happy to say that the returns to our investors have been consistently strong with the average rate being no less than 8% after deduction of our administration fees.

Regulated by the Financial Services Commission of Ontario and the Ontario Securities Commission, our Fund is audited by KPMG LLP Chartered Accountants.

In these uncertain times, who could ask for more?

SOME OF THE REAL ESTATE INVESTMENTS UNDERTAKEN BY OWEMANCO.
OWEMANCO is a private, equity-based mortgage lender, specializing in commercial, industrial and construction financing transactions, including investing.

Can you tell us more about OWEMANCO?

We are essentially a private, equity-based mortgage lender, specializing in commercial, industrial and construction financing transactions. We have two sides to our business – lending and investing.

Founded by Graham Tobe, President and CEO, in 2001, our mission is to offer a competitive source of short-term financing for transactions from $400,000 to $8 million. We do this by underwriting loans on behalf of investors seeking secure investments and consistently strong returns.

Where are you based?

We are headquartered in Toronto and operate from the historic George Jackson House – a heritage building built around 1896 which, incidentally, we own. We have also recently expanded into the US to service a growing customer base there.

How has your performance been since inception? Has it always been this good?

Yes, it has. As I mentioned, the average rate of return to our investors has been no less than 8% over the years, which is very credible considering the state of our economy and the market.

Is there a standard approach to your lending strategy that has contributed to your success?

All mortgages are unique and there cannot be one standard approach. We tailor each strategy to the specific needs of our customer.

Are your investments TFSA, RSP or RIF eligible?

Yes, they are. For those who wish to shelter interest income within their RSP or RIF, OWEMANCO works exclusively with Scotia Private Client Group that serves as the trustee for self-directed registered investments.

What is your secret sauce?

Just hard work and a prudent, practical approach.

Since no investment is guaranteed, we are conservative in our lending approach, always considering an "exit strategy" prior to committing to fund a mortgage. Although all mortgage investments contain some degree of risk, OWEMANCO's main goal is safeguarding principal, while maximizing return.

We are also hands-on managers and administrators with a vested interest in the fund because we put our own money there, too. And lots of it.

So, how can one become an investor? Is there any room for more? Is it easy?

It's filling up fast, however, if anyone acts right away they can be accommodated.

The process of becoming an investor is simple – just call us to set up an appointment. Prior to accepting funds from an investor, we want to understand their needs and circumstances so that we can ensure that we can satisfy their financial objectives.

How does one get in touch with you?

Just call 416-256-1555 x. 232 or 1-866-901-1555 x. 232

IN THESE UNCERTAIN TIMES...

Where do Conservative Investors go to Invest?

OWEMANCO... 8% paid monthly. Redeemable. Reliable.

In a world of uncertainty, how does a boring 8% interest, paid monthly like clockwork, sound? Even better, it's redeemable at your discretion.

OWEMANCO, Ontario Wealth Management Corporation*, invests in a very conservative portfolio of first mortgages secured by real property, primarily in Ontario. We are hands-on managers and administrators with a vested interest in the fund because we put our own money there, too. And lots of it.

Our main goal is safeguarding the principal, while maximizing the return, which has proven remarkably consistent over the years. The OWEMANCO portfolio is growing and is now over $80 million.

The fund is redeemable, flexible and pays interest monthly – or you can reinvest your distributions. What's more, it's RSP, RIF and TFSA eligible.

Providing care to the Sephardi community

Brian Moskowitz
Special to The CJN

Despite his hectic schedule, Yehuda Azoulay drove straight into late Friday afternoon Toronto traffic.

After hearing about a new charitable organization catering to the needs of the city's Sephardi community, the 25-year-old father of two knew he'd found an opportunity to acknowledge those who helped establish the community and are keeping one of Judaism's most important commandments: visiting the sick and elderly.

With wide smiles and an exchange of kisses on both cheeks, Azoulay, one of the volunteers of all ages who reach out to community members on a regular basis, greeted his octogenarian hosts, who have asked not to have their names used.

Originally from Marrakesh, the couple lives far from the rest of the community and have limited mobility, he said.

"I felt like they were my grandparents," said Azoulay, who works in his family's printing business while pursuing a master of education along with rabbinic ordination.

Many elderly Sephardim who began arriving in Canada in the 1930s speak Spanish, French and Arabic, which can be challenging both practically and emotionally, explained Denise Benzaquen Levin, who founded Rav Hesed – Sephardic Bikur Cholim in honour of her parents, Aaron and Vida Benzaquen, who arrived in Canada by boat from Morocco in 1958.

"There are people like my parents, who speak Spanish but have difficulty hearing. Trying to book Wheel-Trans with a host of [telephone] menus to navigate or even calling to order a newspaper can be very challenging and frustrating," she said. Even when the phone volume is raised, menus are not repeated and the language barrier gets in the way, or they simply forget about their appointment, she added.

"It's like being served in Yiddish, which is mamaloshen for Ashkenazim, so these are our mamaloshens: Spanish, Arabic and French."

Although many Sephardim speak different dialects of Ladino, Benzaquen Levin said that in the few months Rav Hesed has been operating, no one has requested help in Ladino.

Sephardim make up roughly 10 per cent of Toronto's Jewish community, and Azoulay pointed out that some of the community's elderly members aren't being seen.

"It's not a Sephardi or Ashkenazi thing – it's a Jewish thing," said Azoulay.

"When I first heard about this charity, I didn't understand why it was necessary to have another one," he said, referring to Toronto's Bikur Cholim established shortly after World War II.

"Then I understood: the language barrier, the mentality, the connection to rabbis and other important Sephardi figures," along with other facets of Sephardi cultures such as body language, religious literature and music, he said.

'It's like being served in Yiddish, which is mameloshon for Ashkenazim, so these are our mamaloshens: Spanish, Arabic and French'

"Right now we're going through the first generation of older people that still require the language and culture, so it's important that we have people who can relate to the older generation," said Rabbi Amram Assayag, chief Sephardi rabbi of Toronto.

From left are Vida Benzaquen, Denise Benzaquen Levin and Aaron Benzaquen. The children are the Benzaquens' great-grandchildren. Rav Hesed is dedicated to Benzaquen Levin's parents.

Rabbi Assayag mentioned the benefit young people can gain through learning from the elderly, as well as the importance of performing acts of chesed or loving-kindness.

Rav Hesed's volunteers provide comfort to families in their time of need, said Brindy Ehrentreu, intake co-ordinator at Toronto Bikur Cholim.

Ehrentreu said the organization refers Sephardi clients to Rav Hesed for this very reason.

"It's that little bit extra that gives them reassurance and a certain security," she said.

"Whatever Denise needs, we're here to help her, whether the support is moral, material or otherwise."

Benzaquen Levin explained that the assistance Rav Hesed provides can play a fundamental role in the emotional well-being of both clients and their families.

"The hardest mitzvah in the Torah is honouring one's parents because when someone gets older they can become anxious, and sometimes they can't manage their emotions. They see that they're aging, and it's a really hard stage which often frightens them. You're only human and you get anxious too."

Benzaquen Levin hopes to have the charity registered soon and currently funds it herself, but no organization exists without the help and generosity of its volunteers, she said.

"When food is delivered, Rav Hesed's wonderful volunteers consider it to be part of their mitzvah, and do not ask for reimbursement. If it ever became an issue, we would certainly cover the expenses."

Couple donate $1.2M to T.O.'s Jewish camping programs

An event celebrating Jewish camps hosted by the Foundation for Jewish Camp (FJC) was highlighted by the presentation of a gift of $1.2 million from Alan and Hinda Silber to Toronto Jewish camping programs.

The event, on July 11, celebrated not-for-profit Jewish overnight camps and in particular programs such as TopBunk, which is part of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Jewish Camp Incentive Program. TopBunk is part of the FJC's One Happy Camper program – which provides need-blind grants for first-time campers at FJC supported camps. One Happy Camper will be matching the Silbers' donation.

FJC's only Toronto-based board members, Ab Flatt and Gerry Maldoff, said that these programs are important because they get as many kids into Jewish camps as possible.

Ted Sokolsky

"Living a Jewish life is what creates Jewish continuity," Maldoff said. "If you believe in Jewish continuity, Jewish camps are the easiest and cheapest way to do it."

More than 1,000 children in Toronto have attended a Jewish camp with help from TopBunk. Since 2008, federation has partnered with FJC to provide the TopBunk grant. Surveys through FJC show that 55 per cent of the children who attend camp with help from TopBunk would have chosen non-Jewish summer activities if not for the grant.

Ted Sokolsky, federation president, said it's important to encourage people to invest in Jewish camps. He added that his experience at a Jewish camp, Camp Kvutzah, was how he developed his involvement in Jewish life, and it's important for children to have that experience.

"It's such a great environment to get kids comfortable with their Jewish identity," Sokolsky said. "Anything we can do to get people to make a decision to send kids to those kinds of camps is a good thing."

Jeremy Fingerman

Jeremy Fingerman, CEO of FJC, said the most important reason to celebrate Jewish camps is that they work to get kids connected to other aspects of Jewish life.

"There's data that backs up this story. All the figures indicate the camp works," Fingerman said. "Children get to know the smile and joy of being Jewish."

An FJC survey found that as Jewish adults, alumni of Jewish camps are 55 per cent more likely to feel emotionally attached to Israel, 45 per cent more likely to attend synagogue once a month, and 30 per cent more likely to donate to a Jewish federation, as compared to adults who didn't attend camp.

"It's an integral part of the Jewish life cycle," Maldoff said. "It introduces them to Jewish concepts and rituals in a non- threatening way."

The FJC, founded in 1998, works to increase the number of children attending Jewish camps. The foundation also provides professional development for full-time and summer-camp professionals, including a training program for third-year camp counsellors, and consulting services and loans to help camps expand and remain competitive.

The FJC has partnerships with almost 40 different communities across North America, and in 2009 the foundation made it possible for more than 7,000 campers to attend 125 different camps.

The Toronto celebration was the first FJC event held in the city.

"It's very important to have someone in this board representing Toronto because we're such a great community for Jewish camping," Flatt said. "The mission made great sense, and this event is to introduce the local community to Jewish camps."

The room at the Park Hyatt Toronto was packed with people representing different camps. The event included speeches from Elisa Bildner, who founded FJC with her husband, Rob, after they realized that there was no overarching organization to support Jewish camps, and a counsellor from Camp George made a speech about how attending Jewish camps has affected his life as a Jewish adult.

Chairman of the FJC board, Skip Vichness, spoke about how Jewish camp connects children to the Jewish community.

Fingerman said that his involvement came from the desire to give back after the positive experiences he had at camp.

"I just look in the mirror," he said. "I was fortunate enough to be sent to camp, and the impact it has on me over 30 years later makes me want to help children have the opportunity to go to camp."

Brutal, vile murders

First we feel shock. Then a sort of numbness and disbelief set in. They give way to revulsion and anger. Ultimately, the initial responses and surging emotions yield to sadness and sorrow for the families of the murdered men, women and children.

Anders Behring Breivik, a 32-year-old Norwegian, has been charged with the murder of nearly 100 people last Friday in Norway. He confessed. He is alleged to have detonated a car bomb outside government headquarters in Oslo that killed as many as 13 people, and to have gunned down – in calculating, sadistic, cold blood – at least 85 mostly young people at a summer camp on Utoya Island.

In his evil, twisted mind, Breivik actually believed he was helping his native Norway and Europe. On the day of the slaughters, he posted a manifesto of his set of beliefs that expresses the views of the far right of the political spectrum in Europe. Among other goals, he wants to re-Christianize Europe, urging "the deportation of all Muslims from Europe."

Breivik's disdain of Muslims purported also to translate into a support of Israel. But a murderer's support is no support at all. Erwin Kohn, newly elected head of the 750-member Jewish community of Oslo, made this quite clear in an interview with JTA: "You have many others who are in the same ballpark, being scared of multiculturalism," Kohn said, adding that Breivik's alleged pro-Zionism is a sham. "We don't need such friends."

Serge Cwajgenbaum, secretary general of the European Jewish Congress, emphasized the point even further. He told the JTA that Breivik "is not pro-Israel. He is anti-Muslim."

Israeli President Shimon Peres telephoned Norwegian King Harald V on Sunday to convey Israel's condolences. The murders "broke our hearts," he told the king. "This is a tragedy that hurts and touches every human being," he added.

During a cabinet meeting on Sunday, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said: "[We] declare our deepest shock over this crime. We have experienced it from other directions and we know the families' and the nation's agony. Therefore, I again send the condolences of the state, government and people of Israel to the Norwegian people, state and government."

Hatred destroys. Whether dripping from the left or from the right, from religious, racial or ideological absolutism, it can corrode a human heart so totally that it would embrace vile, brutal murder in the name of national service.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper spoke for all Canadians when he said: "Canada condemns these barbarous and senseless acts of violence and our thoughts and prayers are with the victims, witnesses and all those affected by these attacks."

To vanquish such violence, to vanquish terror, we must vanquish hatred.

Concert not what it appears to be

The Toronto community must know that the Israeli music performer scheduled for this Aug. 9 at Earl Bales Park is actually a Jew for Jesus missionary. Posters advertising Dan David's concert depict him with a large kippah and claim that he'll be playing "Jewish-flavoured" music at an event where some of the proceeds will be benefiting Gilad Schalit, the Israeli soldier held captive since 2006.

The concert is being presented by the City of Toronto, and its promotional listings simply describe Dan David as an "Israeli folk group." Promotional posters for the concert designed to attract a Jewish audience have been found in kosher eateries and give absolutely no indication of who Dan David actually is.

David's web pages reveal that he is anything but a simple "Israeli folk group." He explains how he uses his music to "encourage those who don't know Yeshua (Jesus) to seek after him." David's Hoshiana Ministries claims he works in tandem with "other [evangelical Christian] ministries that share the gospel of the Messiah." David regularly performs for Christian missionary organizations that target Jewish people for conversion.

Most of those attending this concert, which takes place on Tisha b'Av, will be his fan base from among fellow Messianic Jews and evangelical Christians. However, they will certainly mingle with others attending the concert and use the event as an opportunity to befriend Jewish people in order to share their faith.

UN recognition of a Palestinian state

Between 1947 and 1949, Israel was waging a campaign to gain de jure and de facto acceptance as a sovereign state, even though the Balfour Declaration called for the establishment of a Jewish "homeland", not a "state" for the Jews ("The fallout from a Palestinian declaration of statehood," June 10). Thus, most of the members of the United Nations and the UN itself did not recognize Israel as a sovereign state in 1948.

In Washington, the State Department, led by Gen. George C. Marshall, argued against recognizing Israel's declaration of independence and was supported by almost every senior member of his staff. The U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff issued 13 papers between 1945 and 1948 against American support of Israel and the establishment of a Jewish state. Persistent lobbying by Israel, Jewish American money and votes in the U.S. presidential election convinced President Harry S. Truman to give de facto, but not de jure, recognition of the State of Israel on May 14, 1948. However the start of the Cold War persuaded the U.S. Chiefs of Staff to see Israel as a strategic ally, leading Truman to recognize Israel de jure, legally a state with all the right, privileges and responsibilities as such.

Similarly, UN recognition of a Palestinian State would change the relationship between the Palestinian Authority and Israel. Under international law, a sovereign state is "normally understood to be a state that is neither dependent on nor subject to any other power or state." Hence the message would be clear. Israel is in violation of international law by maintaining its occupation and settlements.

'Israeli apartheid' is antisemitism

Jacob Schiff writes that the term "Israeli apartheid" is not antisemitic because it is a charge about Israeli policy, not about who the Jews are ("Israeli apartheid" not antisemitism, letters, July 14). I cannot agree. The Israeli apartheid brand analogizes Jews in the Levant to Dutch and British Europeans in South Africa – as latecomers without roots in the region. Those who ply "Israeli apartheid" seek to recast Jews as a collection of unconnected foreigners with only spiritual beliefs in common. They work to rub out the unity, history and collective memory of the Jewish people in order to deny our right to self-determination that is a cornerstone of public international law. The Israeli apartheid brand is a campaign to undermine the validity of the Jewish state by erasing who we are. That is antisemitic.

Will Murdoch's 'troubles' affect support for Israel?

Ron Kampeas
JTA

Pro-Israel leaders in the United States, Britain and Australia are warily watching the unfolding of the phone-hacking scandal that is threatening to engulf the media empire of Rupert Murdoch, founder of News Corp.

Murdoch's sudden massive reversal of fortune – with 10 top former staffers and executives under arrest in Britain for hacking into the phones of public figures and a murdered schoolgirl, and paying off the police and journalists – has supporters of Israel worried that a diminished Murdoch presence may mute the strongly pro-Israel voice of many of the publications he owns.

"His publications and media have proven to be fairer on the issue of Israel than the rest of the media," said Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. "I hope that won't be impacted."

Murdoch's huge stable encompasses broadsheets such as the Wall Street Journal, the Times of London and the Australian, as well as tabloids, most notably the Sun in Britain and the New York Post. It also includes the influential Fox News Channel in the United States and a 39 per cent stake in British Sky Broadcasting, or BSkyB, a satellite broadcaster. Murdoch founded the neoconservative flagship the Weekly Standard in 1995, and sold it last year.

Jewish leaders said that Murdoch's view of Israel's dealings with the Palestinians and with its Arab neighbours seemed both knowledgeable and sensitive to the Jewish state's self-perception as beleaguered and isolated.

"My own perspective is simple: We live in a world where there is an ongoing war against the Jews," Murdoch said last October at an Anti-Defamation League dinner in his honour. "When Americans think of antisemitism, we tend to think of the vulgar caricatures and attacks of the first part of the 20th century. Now it seems that the most virulent strains come from the left. Often this new antisemitism dresses itself up as legitimate disagreement with Israel."

Murdoch, 80, has visited Israel multiple times and met with many of its leaders. In 2009 he was honoured by the American Jewish Committee.

"In the West, we are used to thinking that Israel cannot survive without the help of Europe and the United States," he said at the AJC event. "Tonight I say to you, maybe we should start wondering whether we in Europe and the United States can survive if we allow the terrorists to succeed in Israel."

Leaders of a number of pro-Israel groups declined to comment for this story because of Murdoch's current difficulties. On July 19 he and his son, James, testified before a parliamentary committee in London.

Murdoch also has been seen as a friend of the Jews in the Diaspora, even though Fox has irritated the Jewish establishment for championing at times what many Jews perceive as the margins of right-wing thinking – for instance, when Fox host Bill O'Reilly defended Mel Gibson's 2004 movie The Passion of the Christ.

When some Jewish organizational leaders complained that Fox talk show host Glenn Beck was relying on antisemitic tropes in peddling discredited theories about liberal billionaire financier George Soros, Murdoch nudged Fox chief Roger Ailes into meetings with Jewish leaders. Beck left Fox last month.

Murdoch's affection for Israel arose less out of his conservative sensibility than from his native Australian sympathy for the underdog fending off elites seized by conventional wisdoms, according to Isi Liebler, a longtime Australian Jewish community leader who now lives in Israel.

"From my personal communications with him, it's something that built up," Liebler told JTA. "He's met Israelis, he's been to Israel, he's seen Israel as the plucky underdog when the rest of the world saw Israel as an occupier."

Australian Jews noted the pro-Israel cast of Murdoch's papers as early as the 1970s, before he had established ties with the Jewish community. The word from inside his company was that Israel was an issue that he cared about, which helped shape its coverage in his media properties.

Robert Fisk, a veteran Middle East correspondent and a fierce critic of Israel who worked for the Murdoch-owned Times of London from 1981 until 1988, eventually quit and moved to the Independent because of what he said was undue editorial interference in his writing. Recalling those days, Fisk said Murdoch's influence trickled down through editors who understood that he wanted his media to reflect his outlook.

"I don't believe Murdoch personally interfered in any of the above events," Fisk wrote recently in the Independent, describing the decisions that drove him away from the Times. "He didn't need to. He had turned the Times into a tame, pro-Tory, pro-Israeli paper shorn of all editorial independence."

In recent days, Murdoch has appeared wan and battered by the crisis that already has shut down a flagship paper, the News of the World, and scuttled his takeover plans for BSkyB.

The question now circulating in pro-Israel circles is whether the empire's pro-Israel stance will survive Murdoch.

"Is this curtains for pro-Israel Murdoch?" the London Jewish Chronicle asked in a column last week.

An account of a clash over Israel between Murdoch and his son and heir apparent was first published in the diaries of Labour Party publicist Alastair Campbell and has splashed through pro- and anti-Israel blogs in recent days.

Campbell, in an account republished last week in the Guardian, which has led the coverage of the phone-hacking charges, described a dinner at 10 Downing St., the British prime minister's residence, in 2002, when Tony Blair – also seen as pro-Israel – was its occupant.

"Murdoch said he didn't see what the Palestinians' problem was and James said it was that they were kicked out of their f---ing homes and had nowhere to f---ing live," the account in the Guardian said. Murdoch chided his son for using foul language in the prime minister's home.

Liebler said that from what he understood, the incident was an anomaly and one that emerged during one of the most intense periods of Israeli-Palestinian clashes.

"He's had differences with his son on many issues, and this happened once and it went off the map," Liebler said. "I don't think it was anything fundamental."

TV host Beck changes Jerusalem rally location

JTA

JERUSALEM — Talk show host Glenn Beck said he is moving the location of his planned Jerusalem rally due to security concerns.

On his satellite radio show and in an announcement on YouTube, Beck said his "Restoring Courage" rally on Aug. 24 will not be held at the Southern Wall of Jerusalem's Old City because of rumours that 40,000 Muslims would be atop the Temple Mount. He quoted his security detail as saying that "these people play for keeps."

Beck said he would announce the rally's new location next week but that it may be on the Mount of Olives.

He noted that his security detail has been upset about the Southern Wall venue since it was selected and recalled that on a previous visit to Israel, he witnessed Muslims throwing stones from the Temple Mount down on Jewish worshippers at the Western Wall.

"Courage must be coupled with wisdom, and the last thing we want to happen is for anyone to be injured in any way or there to be any kind of conflict," he said.

Glenn Beck was recently in Israel where he spoke to members of the Knesset.

Beck said the original location was divinely inspired

"When I picked this location, I did not pick it," he said. "I truly believe it was selected for me."

Beck addressed the Knesset immigration, absorption and Diaspora affairs committee earlier in the month. His show on Fox News aired for the final time at the end of June.

Summertime and the living is easy

In Hebrew, we call this time of year "Cucumber Season." I don't for certain know why. There are several explanations, but none are definitive. During these hot months, nothing too newsworthy is supposed to happen, no sports league is active, kids and Knesset members are on holiday, half the country is on vacation somewhere abroad.

That's not always the case, however, especially here in the Mideast, where it's never boring and no one knows what's looming just round the corner. Five summers ago, unexpectedly, the Second Lebanese War raged ferociously for more than a month.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Thankfully, no war has broken out this year. At least not yet.

But this summer has already produced a fair dollop of stirring news items.

Having solved all other human rights issues in this area, including those of Syria's enlightened Arab Spring, hundreds of anti-Israel activists from civilized and less civilized parts of the world converged on the picturesque ports of Greece, hoping to plough the waves on their merry way to breaking Israel's blockade of Gaza. In contrast to last year's Gaza flotilla fiasco, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his government deserve great praise for adroitly thwarting this year's sailing.

We now await September. Assuming the Palestinians don't capitulate to western diplomatic pressure (they won't) and relinquish their scheme to get UN General Assembly recognition of Palestine as a full-fledged member of the community of nations, the fallout will be dramatic and might also be violent.

Between these two scenarios, Netanyahu's coalition is using the democratic tools at its disposal to try and silence its opposition. Its latest success is the "Anti-Boycott Bill," which became law July 11 and allows "citizens to bring civil suits against persons and organizations that call for economic, cultural or academic boycotts against Israel, Israeli institutions or regions under Israeli control." The law's objective is to intimidate Israeli individuals and organizations that call for boycotts of goods produced in West Bank settlements.

And while this law is challenged in the courts, Netanyahu's coalition isn't resting on its laurels. It has several other questionable parliamentary initiatives up its proverbial sleeve, aimed at stifling critics, mostly human rights groups. These include limiting foreign donations to non-profit organizations and raising their taxes if they're not receiving government funding. And because they fear the Supreme Court might declare these laws unconstitutional, some Knesset members are revisiting draft legislation that would limit the Court's authority.

Opponents insist these and other tactics are placing Israel's democracy on a slippery downward slope. Supporters assert their democratic right to further their agenda through legislation.

As if summer isn't hot enough, the debate is searing. It always is here in Israel. You get used to it. We live life to its fullest despite the tensions.

And there's no better time for that than the summer, when there's so much to do.

To start with, lots of folks (yours truly excluded – I am a Jerusalemite after all) head straight for the beaches with their golden sands and Mediterranean sunsets.

Others prefer hiking in nature. The 1,000-kilometre Israel Trail, from the Lebanese border down south to Taba on the Egyptian frontier, has become a favourite of young and old, with people choosing to do one or two of its sections at a time. During these hot days, I'd recommend the Golan Heights' Nahal Yehudiya, which I enjoyed with my son and some friends a month ago. Not part of the trail, the Yehudia is a fun and challenging day-long hike that's mostly shaded and takes you into a deep canyon, waterfalls, natural pools and an astonishing amount of water. You won't believe you're in Israel.

For those wanting something more urbane, culture is oozing everywhere. Almost every kibbutz, moshav, town and city is holding some sort of festival. Here in Jerusalem, options are numerous and diverse. My favourite is a project called Balabasta. As described in its website, each Monday evening in July, the Machane Yehuda fruit and vegetable market "transforms into an enchanting mix of poets and parsley, musicians and baklava, players and pedlars," all marvelously tantalizing the senses.

And Shabbat. There's nothing like the quiet that descends here Friday afternoon.

Later, round the dinner table with friends and family, conversation will inexorably reach the week's politics and events. It's neither the Knesset nor the press, but the debate can get pretty vociferous!

Five years since war in Lebanon

Five years have passed since Hezbollah attacked northern Israel, killing three Israeli soldiers, wounding two, and abducting two more (later discovered to have been killed in action). In response to this and previous attacks, Israel launched a major operation to rescue the soldiers and deter Hezbollah – Iran's proxy on Israel's border. In the five-week war, Hezbollah launched thousands of rockets, paralyzing northern Israel, killing more than 100 Israelis, and forcing hundreds of thousands to flee.

Militarily, the Israeli response reflected the lack of proper preparation and an inexperienced leadership. But it was sufficient. Deterrence was restored, and for the past five years, Hezbollah has not fired rockets or kidnapped more soldiers, although Iran has delivered tens of thousands of rockets, predictably ignoring UN resolutions. And Hezbollah's brave leader has delivered fiery speeches from underground bunkers for fear of an Israeli attack.

But in the political war, Israel was defeated by a flood of false accusations of "war crimes," "indiscriminate and disproportionate" force and "violations of international law." Human Rights Watch (HRW) and Amnesty International – ostensibly neutral watchdogs – led this campaign. In 35 days, they issued over 40 press releases, statements and pseudo fact-finding reports, mostly condemning the Israeli response, and ignoring the war crimes committed by the terrorist organization.

The HRW and Amnesty allegations were immediately repeated, at face value, by the world's media – including Canadian newspapers and the CBC. Politicians joined the attack, and Michael Ignatieff, then Liberal deputy leader, echoed the war crimes accusation, without any fact-checking.

Now, a detailed and systematic study of all the HRW and Amnesty allegations about the 2006 war in Lebanon proves that these had no credibility. In this systematic research, supported by the Israel Science Foundation, my colleague Prof. Abraham Bell and I found major contradictions, as well as numerous unsupported charges and false or invented "evidence."

The most blatant example was the incident in Qana, a Shiite town in southern Lebanon and a major Hezbollah stronghold, that was struck by Israel after heavy rocket attacks. One of the buildings was hit and collapsed, causing a number of deaths and injuries. Within hours, HRW blasted a press release in which executive director Ken Roth claimed that the "Israeli military is treating southern Lebanon as a free-fire zone, relating to the strike on Qana, killing at least 54 civilians, more than half of them children." HRW then launched a campaign charging Israel with war crimes, with nine separate "reports" and op-eds, as well as press conferences.

HRW's campaign was echoed in media headlines, creating intense international pressure and leading then-prime minister Ehud Olmert to declare a "48-hour suspension of aerial activity pending an investigation." A unilateral halt in military action due to unverified NGO allegations was unprecedented and allowed Hezbollah forces to regroup, prolonging the war and probably costing many lives.

Yet, as our research reveals, HRW had no credible evidence for its claims. Roth, researcher Lucy Mair (who had written propaganda for The Electronic Intifada before joining HRW), together with others far from the battleground, inflated civilian casualty claims and erased Hezbollah attacks (the real war crimes).

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

To create the façade of "fact finding," the initial HRW statement referred to "researchers" in Lebanon, but no names were provided. Later reports either provided no sources or attributed allegations to "witnesses" who could well have been Hezbollah allies or operatives. The allegations that Israel had criminally and deliberately bombed Lebanese civilians were unsourced and false.

As the contradictions emerged, HRW's Mair admitted that the Lebanese Red Cross had reported 28 dead, including Hezbollah "martyrs," but HRW chose to use much higher numbers, while erasing the context.

Qana is one of several major cases of HRW's false reporting on Lebanon, and Amnesty acted in a similarly irresponsible manner. But there was little interest in the NGO fabrications, even among Israeli officials.

Instead, the NGO role in Lebanon became a model for expanded political warfare, based on the Durban strategy seeking the "total international isolation of Israel" through false accusations of war crimes. The 2009 NGO-Goldstone report on the Gaza war followed the same pattern, on a larger scale, with an even greater cost.

In contrast, our detailed study shows that HRW and Amnesty were far from the expert and neutral sources they claim to be. At least on issues related to Israel, these groups exploit their power and the façade of expertise in a highly immoral manner.

Filmmaker makes first documentary of its kind

On the face of it, there is no connection whatsoever between an infamous Japanese massacre of 300,000 civilians in China in 1937 and the Nazi mass murder of Jews during the Holocaust. But after completing The Nanjing Massacre: Memory and Oblivion, released in 2006, French filmmaker Michael Prazan wondered why no one had ever bothered making a documentary about the Einsatzgruppen, the Nazi paramilitary death squads whose terrible and enduring legacy is the slaughter of more than one million people, mainly Jews, in the Soviet Union.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Einsatzgruppen, commanded by Germans, left a bloody trail of death in Russia, Ukraine, Belarus and the Baltic states, inciting pogroms and killing Jews, communists, political dissidents and so-called saboteurs after Germany invaded the Soviet Union in June 1941, in what the Nazis described as a merciless war of annihilation.

In places like the Ponary forest, Rumbula, Babi Yar, Kaunas and Minsk, the Einsatzgruppen – consisting of four units with about 3,000 armed men drawn from local ethnic groups and Soviet prisoners of war – obliterated Jewish communities in the first systematic orgy of killings during the Holocaust.

Formed under the direction of the SS and attached to the German army, the Einsatzgruppen were rendered obsolete by fixed extermination camps such as Auschwitz-Birkenau, Treblinka and Sobibor.

After finishing The Nanjing Massacre, Prazan, whose grandparents perished in a Nazi death camp in Poland, asked himself why no one had ever made a documentary film about such an important topic as the Einsatzgruppen.

More than merely curious about this omission, Prazan spent the next three years doing something about it. The result of his labours is Einsatzgruppen: The Death Brigades, a chilling and compelling two-part, three-hour film that was screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival in May.

Strictly speaking, Einsatzgruppen is not the first film on the subject. As Prazan noted in an interview, a Lithuanian filmmaker preceded him, but he focused exclusively on Lithuania. Still others have mentioned the Einsatzgruppen in passing in documentaries on the Holocaust.

Uniquely, Prazan's movie examines their role in the Final Solution on a global European scale. Nevertheless, Prazan, 41, is still surprised that Einsatzgruppen is the first documentary of its kind.

In retrospect, he believes it could not have been made before the fall of communism in Europe in the late 1980s and early 1990s. Until then, archives that held documents and photographs about the Einsatzgruppen were off limits to researchers.

Having decided to make Einsatzgruppen, Prazan had to act quickly. "Perpetrators, bystanders and survivors were dying," he explained. "It was really for me a question of time."

Absorbed by the urgency of the project, he delved into the literature of the Holocaust. "I read a lot of books, maybe everything," said Prazan, whose interest in the Holocaust was piqued by the American made-for-television movie, Holocaust. "I was shocked by the scenes in which Jews are shot and then thrown into pits," he said.

Michael Prazan

And then he read Raul Hilberg's The Destruction of European Jews, the standard work in Holocaust historiography.

Prazan's father, Bernard, a Polish Jew born in Paris and and hidden by the resistance movement during Germany's occupation of France, never spoke about his wartime experiences. "After the war, he just wanted to live."

In preparation for making Einsatzgruppen, Prazan also visited the U.S. Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C., and examined its collection of photographs.

The Nazis, in typical, methodical fashion, filmed atrocities. But with defeat and war crimes trials looming, they also destroyed footage of their murderous rampages.

As well, Prazan obtained photographs taken by German troops in contravention of army regulations. "They had Leica cameras and photographed everything."

Prazan purchased these photographs from a friend, a Russian historian who scoured second-hand bookshops in Germany, Austria and Belgium.

He found yet more telling photographs by working with a Latvian archivist for two years.

Finally, he consulted historians such as Christopher Browning, who appears in Einsatzgruppen amid a parade of Jewish survivors, Lithuanian witnesses and German and Lithuanian perpetrators.

Prazan talked to a Jew who was forced to exhume and burn the corpses of Jewish victims. "The sky was lit up," he said by way of describing the Nazis' attempt to cover up their crimes.

While interviewing bystanders, he talked to a man who recalled the blood-curdling screams of Jews in a forest. Another witness said, "The Jews didn't know they were about to die." A third bystander remembered having seen shooters rip gold teeth from the mouths of victims and grab jewelry from their bodies.

Prazan made a point of interviewing only bystanders who were young enough not to have been perpetrators.

He travelled widely, spending a month in Ukraine, which he described as "a big graveyard."

A young German historian supplied him with the names of perpetrators. When he met them, he presented himself as the grandson of a French SS member, a ploy he admits was unethical.

Members of death squads in Lithuania, as taken from Einsatzgruppen.

"They would not have agreed to be interviewed had they known I'm Jewish."

Not surprisingly, they denied having been members of the Einsatzgruppen, but opened up after Prazan used a hidden camera to record their candid comments.

"They loved to speak. They were delighted that a young person wanted to talk to them. They expressed no remorse, but no antisemitism either. They claimed they were following orders. The only thing they regretted was that Germany lost the war."

Prazan, who was a French literature high school teacher in a Paris suburb before turning to filmmaking, is hardly surprised that Einsatzgruppen leaders, hardened men like Franz Six, Otto Ohlendorf and Artur Nebe, had advanced degrees from German universities.

"A good education doesn't mean you won't engage in barbaric behaviour," he said.

Einsatzgruppen has garnered respectable reviews, but has received limited exposure, having been broadcast on French and Israeli TV channels and screened at festivals in Poland and New York City.

North American distributors, wary of its sombre topic and length, have not bought the film.

Prazan, whose first movie was on the Japanese Red Army – the terrorist group that killed 24 people in an attack at Ben Gurion Airport in 1972 – has just finished making a film on the Eichmann trial in Jerusalem, and is now adding the final touches to a documentary on international terrorism.

Retired Ben-Gurion U leader is lifelong Zionist

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Leo Marcus, 78, who recently retired as national executive vice-president of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University (BGU), has spent 57 years in Jewish public life.

"I didn't come into this field by accident. I came to Jewish public service because I wanted to help Israel."

Growing up in Belleville, Ont., he said, he remembers the exact moment he knew the importance of a Jewish state.

"We received a letter from cousins in Majdanek concentration camp, who said they were being looked after well but felt sad since Uncle Lechem died. We didn't have an Uncle Lechem, and as we read between the lines, it became clear that they had no bread – they were starving to death.

"That impacted in me the need for a Jewish state. I became a Zionist at that moment."

Marcus, who is married with three children and five grandchildren, said he met his wife at Camp Shalom when he was the head counsellor. "It is a Young Judaea Camp, and I found it [quite fitting] to [have met] my wife at a Zionist camp."

Leo Marcus

He was "truly bitten" by Israel, he said, when he spent one year there between high school and university under the auspices of the Jewish Agency.

"I went on, at age 22, to become executive director of United Israel Appeal and Jewish National Fund in Vancouver. I spent 15 years there."

Marcus then became national director of the United Jewish Appeal and the UIA in Montreal for 10 years, and moved on to Israel, where he was director general of UIA in Jerusalem. "We spent eight years there, and I left Israel with a heavy heart," he said. "Our children and grandchildren were here, though, and we wanted to be with family."

He went to work for BGU, where he remained until June 30 when he retired.

The university, which started out with 5,000 students, now has 20,000, he said, and is recognized as the leader in desert food production.

"Students, who have done [such things as make sea water drinkable] are being taught how to make the desert a positive thing."

His main job at BGU has been fundraising and raising awareness of the university. "I talked about things that I thought would interest Canadians."

He has retired now, he said, "because I've been under pressure for 57 years. I used to fly 100,000 miles a year, and I've been to Israel more than 100 times. Now I want time without pressure."

Looking back on his career, Marcus said that "as a Zionist, it is a thrilling thing to have played my own small part in Jewish state building. I have helped strengthen Israel

"It has been exciting, and I'm grateful to have been given the opportunity to help. In all these years, there has never been a dull moment."

JVS' cheerleader retires

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Karen Goldenberg, 67, who recently retired after 12 years as president and CEO of JVS Toronto, likened her job to that of a cheerleader.

"I was the spark that ignited all the talent. I cheered my team on and allowed them to be the best they could be," said Goldenberg, a wife, mother of three and grandmother of four.

The recipient of the 2011 UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Gordy Wolfe Leadership Award, Goldenberg said she has left jobs before, "but this is a different leaving. This job connected me to the Jewish community. When I joined JVS at age 55, I felt it was time to marry my professional and personal lives. I had worked in the secular community in leadership roles for over 30 years, creating and growing businesses, and JVS provided me with an exciting opportunity, [as well as] my entrée to Jewish communal work.

"My [work] background was health, but I always believed that productive employment and activity is a predeterminant of health, so my shift to social services in workforce development was a fit.

"I invested myself into this organization, and I loved it. When I love something, it becomes part of my life. For 12 years, I lived with my husband, Sydney, and with JVS."

JVS is a Jewish organization, she said, but it serves the whole community. It now offers services in several areas of the city. "We don't just sit on Tycos Drive [any more.] We're on the road. We work with people at our expense, at health, community and outreach centres.

"This was something I brought in. I wanted to bring our programs to the people, and the communities embraced us. We were launched from a northwest Jewish agency to an organization that serves everyone."

Karen Goldenberg

She is retiring at a time when she is ready for a change – "a change in lifestyle, and a change in the rhythm of my life that has been dominated by the balance of family and work for over 40 years, with work sometimes getting more than its fair share of my time and energy."

Goldenberg said that as she looks back over the 12 years, "I see an organization that has tripled in size, not just in revenue, but in scope and influence. JVS Toronto has become a key player in the Toronto landscape, and I believe it has been due to the vision of the board and staff, who have worked as a strong and passionate team."

When she "no longer goes to 74 Tycos Dr. every morning," she said, she will work part time with her son Michael in his new business, Debt-Care Canada, and do some consulting with an emerging youth organization.

"As well, I plan to work out at the JCC, travel to Vancouver often to see my grandchildren, and see faraway places with friends."

UJA's Director of Israel Engagement to receive prestigious award

Sarah Mali named Jewish Agency's Outstanding Emissary

By Daniel Horowitz

When Sarah Mali arrived at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in 2007, she was having something of an identity crisis.

After all, the 35-year-old London, England-born Mali made aliyah in 2000 and lived in Israel for five years, before moving to the Great White North.

But, despite her somewhat nomadic existence – or perhaps because of it – the affable and articulate Mali quickly made her mark at UJA, and in the community, through her role as Director, Israel Engagement.

"I live on that junction between Israel and the Diaspora," explains Mali. "I love Israel, warts and all. I lived there for five years, and when I'm finished here, I'm going back. I know how important it is to have Israel in your life, especially when you can't be there. For Jews living outside Israel, it's a long-term relationship that must be maintained and enriched."

The Jewish Agency for Israel's (JAFI) Community Shilcha for Toronto, Mali, working in UJA's Community Capacity Building Department, was recently named the recipient of JAFI's Outstanding Emissary Award for 2010-2011.

Then again, JAFI recognition is no stranger to the Mali household as Sarah's husband, Matanya, won a similar award as a teacher shaliach at CHAT in 2009.

"My job at UJA is to integrate Israel into the community using informal and formal educational and religious institutions as the primary vehicles." explains the mother of four. "What I've tried to do is bring Israel front and centre through UJA Federation."

Sarah Mali, far right, with graduates of the UJA Makom Young Emissary Program.

And that's precisely what she's done.

Mali was charged with initiating and building UJA's MAKOM Young Emissary Program in Toronto in 2007, which brings pre-army, Israeli 18 year-olds to the city to engage our youth, and to give them a first-hand, personal Israel education.

The program began with only two shlichim at Holy Blossom Temple and Leo Baeck Day School, and by this summer there will be 14 young emissaries at over 20 community synagogues, schools, youth groups and overnight Jewish summer camps.

"These young emissaries were originally little mechanisms of change to fulfill our initial mandate of drawing more young people to shuls, and to deliver a taste of the real, unmediated Israel," says Mali. "Today, more schools and shuls realize that Israel engagement is a terrific added value for their members and today, they all have budget lines for Israel engagement programs."

While the success of the UJA MAKOM Young Emissary Program is legendary, it was still just the beginning for Mali and UJA Federation.

"We soon realized from our partnering institutions that they were looking for something broader; what we term Israel engagement which is the merging of Israel education and Jewish identity building," says Mali. "We sit on the nexus between education and identity building. We have recently started a new program called the MAKOM Institutional Change Process where we work with day schools and synagogues on a two-year process to re-envision Israel in the context of their institution and to build a strategic plan to implement those changes. We began with young emissaries, but what we're doing today – quite successfully, I believe – is establishing a field of Israel engagement based on expertise, content, professional development and the resources and personnel that can change the face of our community ten years down the line."

"Sarah Mali has been the ideal professional to lead the Israel Engagement initiative in Toronto," says Michael Diamond, Chair, UJA Federation's Israel Engagement Committee. "She has inspired the growth of the Israel Engagement initiative to a newly expanded committee which is spearheading the evolution of the Toronto Jewish community into a fully Israel engaged community, one school, one camp, one synagogue, at a time. From a standing start earlier this year, the newly expanded Israel Engagement committee is poised to have a significant impact on Jewish Toronto in ensuring that Israel - the real Israel - is front and centre in our minds and our hearts. This ambitious agenda could only be accomplished by someone with the vision, the communication skills, the work ethic, the educational expertise and the goodness of someone like Sarah Mali."

Israel harnesses the sun to increase solar power and independence

On Monday, July 4, terrorists, armed with machine guns, detonated explosives, destroying a portion of Egypt's natural gas pipeline responsible for supplying Israel and Jordan.

It was the third such attack on this vital connection between the three countries in the past six months alone.

Israel's dependence on foreign energy highlights the need for homegrown energy alternatives, and is one reason why the region of Eilat/Eilot's remarkable strides as a world leader in solar energy production and renewable energy innovation are more important than ever.

UJA Federation Board Chair Elizabeth Wolfe and President & CEO Ted Sokolsky were recently in Eilat and Eilot, UJA Federation's partner communities through its P2K initiative, and paid a visit to the new solar field at Kibbutz Ketura. The field, launched on June 5th, generates enough energy to power three communities, and is the first of many planned in an effort to have 10 percent of Israel's energy come from renewable sources by 2020.

Working with its partners in Eilat/Eilot when the concept of renewable energy was little more than a dream, UJA Federation funded the entire strategic plan to make it a reality as part of its overall, strategic goal of strengthening Israel's frontier.

UJA Federation Board Chair, Elizabeth Wolfe, with the CEO of Arava Power Company, Jon Cohen, at the new Kibbutz Ketura Solar Field.

Three years ago, UJA Federation began sponsoring Eilat's Annual Renewable Energy Conference which, ultimately, brought together Siemens and the Arava Power Company, the folks behind Kibbutz Ketura. And, with its eyes looking to the future, UJA also invested in the region's elementary and high schools, adding renewable energy to their respective curriculums, equipping students with the tools they need to eventually take jobs in the field if they so choose.

"The sun cannot be sabotaged," said Jon Cohen, CEO of Arava Power Company, an Eilot region-based company leading the way in solar energy production, who met with Wolfe and Sokolsky during their visit. "It is the safest and most available energy source in Israel. Energy security, energy independence and balancing the appropriate combination of energy source are of critical economic importance to Israel's future."

And the Ketura Sun solar field is only the beginning in Israel's quest to become the first major economy to be transformed from carbon-based to solar based. In fact, Arava Power Company has already announced plans to build nearly 50 more solar fields in Israel.

"We should be proud as a Federation that our Israel & Overseas Committee leadership backed the entrepreneurial spirit of the people of Eilat and helped make this bold initiative possible," said Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"The Eilatis spoke of the changes occurring in their region as being 'revolutionary,' said Wolfe. "Locally, not only will the solar energy fields generate crucial income for the kibbutzim whose lands are leased and create new jobs, the entire region is being transformed into a world centre for solar energy, fuelling the transition to renewable energy globally."

Young professionals celebrate in style

Hundreds of young Jewish professionals recently came together to celebrate Jewish Urban Meeting Place's (JUMP) third annual anniversary party.

JUMP is a non-profit organization that provides social, volunteer and educational programming for Jews between the ages of 22 to 34. Located in midtown Toronto, JUMP is a centre where members can relax, schmooze and discover their Jewish identity through innovative and exciting opportunities.

The anniversary party, held on July 7 at This is London nightclub, raised funds to support the organization's mission of empowering its members to become more engaged in their heritage and more active in inspiring positive change in the community.

The event featured a performance by Canadian Idol winner Brian Melo, a live samba squad, a snack and dessert buffet, door prizes and raffles.

For this year's party, event chairs Julian Brass, Alex Bronfman, Marissa Daniels, Ilana Oziel and Dar Refaeli "decided to switch it up in terms of the ambience and atmosphere," said Shlomo Buzaglo, director of programs and trips at JUMP.

"We wanted to break away from what was done in the past and what is usually done at these large scale community events. The food was fun and interactive, with Lollicakes cupcakes, a full out candy and chocolate bar from Kosher Food Warehouse, large hot pretzels, a Dippin Dots ice cream stand, a Spudniks hot potato chips station, and a cotton candy and popcorn station."

Buzaglo said the anniversary party is "one of the more important events for JUMP because this is the night for our constituents and participants to come out and support an organization that works for them."

He said the party shows the Toronto Jewish community that "events and travel opportunities that JUMP provides for young professionals are important and needed in this day and age and that we, as a community, must invest in the future of our nation."

Buzaglo said JUMP is an important organization in the community because there are few options for young adults who want to be engaged in social, cultural and educational programming once they have moved on from university.

"At JUMP we realize the importance of young Jews feeling confident and proud of their Jewish identity and creating opportunities for these people to build on that. Our grassroots approach encourages our participants to become more active in creating and organizing events that they feel are needed in our community."

Once a small organization in 2007, JUMP has grown to offer a dozen programs or events each month, engaging more than 400 young professionals and adults. JUMP's relationships with other community organizations have also evolved into strong partnerships, Buzaglo said.

"I think that so many young professionals are attracted to JUMP because we are a very sincere and friendly organization. We create a space that is inviting and fun to be in and our programming is always creative and relevant to our participants. The opportunities we create are enticing for someone to learn more about Israel and Judaism, volunteer for a great cause, and meet cool new people at the same time."

JUMP's most popular programs include Shabbat dinners and classes on relationships, Buzaglo said. "Our seasonal socials, Chanukah party and art show are always very popular. Mimouna, which is an event we throw the day after Passover ends, always brings out our biggest crowd in the centre. However, the ones that are most inspiring and fun are our Israel trips and New York trips, both of which are very highly subsidized."

JUNCTION SHUL RECEIVES TRILLIUM FOUNDATION GRANT

The Junction Shul (Congregation Knesseth Israel) has received a $28,000 grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation to help the synagogue celebrate its 100th anniversary. Funds will go toward hosting an open house and street festival on Sept. 18. The synagogue has also commissioned the writing of a commemorative book chronicling the history of the shul and its founders. 'This shul's always open, any time of year'

Rachael Czutrin and Alisa Minden, both 27, couldn't resist rolling up their sleeves to join the "kitchen cleanup crew" – tackling messes that looked like they could have been 80 years old. Their first task was to purchase cleaning supplies. The kitchen floor, though, along with much of the basement, must wait for Phase 2 to get its facelift. "We'll be back," said Minden.

Julia Segal, also 27, and a student of naturopathic medicine, has participated in past Lend a Hand projects. She comes to the Minsk for services: "It's very central, very welcoming; Rabbi [Shmuel] Spero is really great. But it needs some love and attention."

Once, there were about 30 shuls in the Kensington Market area, from small minyanim to landmark buildings like Anshei Minsk. Today, only a few remain downtown. Without a large, stable Jewish population nearby – even Rabbi Spero commutes from farther uptown – the Minsk hangs by a shoestring.

"We're a historical shul that keeps on making history," says Rabbi Spero, who's been here since 1988. Twenty-three former "Minskers" have made aliyah in the last few years, while many couples who've met through the shul have moved north into the mainstream Jewish community.

Although the UJA estimates that about 21,000 Jews live downtown, the Minsk serves a transient population including not only students and tourists, but also disenfranchised Jews, who may be homeless or mentally ill. Since a fire in 2002 that caused $200,000 worth of damage – believed to have been started by a homeless person who'd broken in – it's been a constant scramble to keep going, and gaping holes, peeling paint, cluttered stairwells and cracked walls have added up to major disrepair.

The House has received about $800 in donations for materials, and Olympia Tile is supplying tiles for the decrepit bathroom and kitchen. Segall hopes to keep raising funds to continue the effort into Phase Two.

Originally, the group planned only to repair a basement wall. "I came [ahead of time] to look at the wall," says Oren Amoyal, who owns an investment property company and has extensive renovation experience. But, he says, "If I'm going to put a group together to look after one wall, I'm going to maximize the group." So the project grew from a single basement wall to a facelift in a day.

Other contractors and professionals lent expertise, including Jason Davis of Palms Landscaping, and Sarel Simon, Yaniv Trachtenberg and Isaac Haziza, who all came down with power tools to install drywall, build a fireplace in the decrepit inner-city backyard and guide other volunteers. "This is a real amcha [grassroots] effort," says Rabbi Spero.

Elisa Mayer, a kindergarten teacher, diligently swabbed baby wipes over gold names engraved in Hebrew on white marble. She came out "because it's one of the original synagogues of the community," and she wanted to "make sure it's still around."

Beyond its regular daily minyanim and participation in citywide events like Doors Open Toronto, the Minsk receives tourists and visitors year-round – dozens on any given Sunday. Twenty-five people from another Jewish organization tried to come in during the makeover, and Amoyal took a break to give them a quick tour.

"This shul's always open, any time of year," Rabbi Spero says. "Please join us."

Our Jewish journey

Rabbi Mark Fishman

As I begin to update my travel documents, one website reads: "Please allow four to six months of processing time for us to complete your application."

"Due to backlogs and postal delays we are currently experiencing an increased volume of applications," says an automated telephone message.

Was it always this difficult to go somewhere?

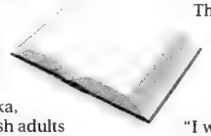
In this week's Torah reading, we learn about the encampments of the Children of Israel during their wanderings through the desert. Undoubtedly, the Exodus from Egypt stands as the central event of our collective narrative. However, when we look more closely at the text, we discover all 42 of the different stops that were made along the way. To have such minute detail seems, at best, a little excessive. At worst, it's boring.

The question is: why would the Torah record all the details of where the Children of Israel stopped along the way?

I believe the answer lies in the sages' dictum, "ma'aseh avot siman l'banim" – the actions of the fathers are a sign of what will happen to the children. This midrashic idea posits that the events that took place in the initial stages of our people's formation are indeed an indicator of what will be in our future. It seems that to journey from one destination to the next is the overriding narrative of the Jewish People. And surely there have been at least 42 stops along the way, if not more: Judea, Babylon, Persia, Rome, Europe, North Africa and the New World.

As Tevye the Milkman says in Fiddler on the Roof when he is banished from Anatevka, "Now you know why Jewish adults wear hats; we must always be ready to set out on a journey!"

Rabbinic Reflections



It would seem that the Jewish journey is always one where the answer to the question "Are we there yet?" is the word "Almost." There always seems to be another tomorrow that needs to be conquered, a distant horizon that continues to keep us from our Promised Land.

Yet what a crucial lesson we learn reading about all of the encampments. To be a part of Jewish destiny is to know that we keep moving forward. The starts and the stops of life are what give us the strength, the courage and the faith to keep travelling on. Fundamental to our history as a nation is that we are constantly on the road to the Promised Land, on the journey toward redemption.

When S.Y. Agnon received the Nobel Prize for Literature, he was asked about his birthplace. To the interviewer's surprise, he answered that he was born in Jerusalem. The interviewer pointed out that everyone knew he had been born in Buczacz, a town in Galicia.

Agnon corrected him: "I was born in Jerusalem more than 3,000 years ago. That was my beginning, my origin. Buczacz in Galicia is only one of the stopping-off points."

We may all wander far and wide in our journey of life. Yet, as long as we travel with our goals in mind, we will assuredly reach our destination.

The unfortunate use of clichés

A cliché is a verbal stereotype. It is a kind of "Procrustean bed" that forces meaning into rigid or preconceived patterns. What follows are a few clichés that I resolve not to use and shall attempt to discourage others from using.

Where there is smoke, there must be fire: This is another way of saying that in every rumour, no matter how outlandish, there must reside some truth. This is one of the most pernicious ideas of our time. It's the kind of nonsense that the bigots of every age are counting on. It's what the witch hunters expect from the weak-minded and the credulous. Where there is smoke, there need not be fire. Gossip and innuendo are improper grounds for making decisions about people or things.

When your number is called, your time is up: This kind of facile fatalism is dangerous because it can become an easy excuse for licence. It can be converted into cheap bravado, masking infantile irresponsibility. Why should the mysteries of the unknown prevent us from calling upon our physical, emotional and mental resources?

If we plan a career and strive for its success, are our chances greater if we leave them to fate? There is no handwriting on the wall, no whirling wheels of fortune, no astral influences. Nothing is preordained. Shakespeare had it right when in Julius Caesar, he has Cassius exclaim: "The fault dear Brutus is not in our stars, but in ourselves."

You can't stand in the way of progress: Why not?

Not everything new or novel is better. Beneath the glitter and facade of the latest idea often resides an old truth. Our vaunted age has shut as many doors as it has opened. We possess great knowledge, but also great confusion and uncertainty. Psychology has opened our minds, but not always our hearts. Physics has widened our universe, but we remain as lonely and circumscribed as ever. Medicine has prolonged our life, but we have filled it with time-killing ennui. In an age concerned with "outer power," we are desperately in search of "inner peace."

War is inevitable: Murder is an indictable offence in every nation, except when the nation as a whole decides to engage in it. Naturalists are convinced that apart from man, animals do not prey on their own kind. They might drive away territorial invaders, but will not pursue them to enslave or kill them. Similarly, social animals often seek new territory in search of food, but do not seek to enlarge existing territory by conquest. Man alone, unfortunately, does such things.

War is a social institution and like any institution it can be abolished, as were cannibalism and slavery.

We live at a time when television screens show the waste and devastation of war. We have embraced as normal something vastly ugly and diseased. And most of us close our eyes to the threat of the atomic age. It is no longer a zero-sum game where one side "wins" while the other side "loses." No, it is mutual suicide beyond rational calculation by weapons of indescribable destructiveness.

Will report influence campus attitudes?

My View

Lawrence Hart

The inquiry panel of the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Antisemitism (CPCCA) released its long-awaited report on July 7. The 80-page document is the culmination of a process that began in March 2009, when 22 members of our House of Commons and Senate, representing all political parties, began an exploration of the scope, identity and nature of antisemitism in the Canadian context.

As might have been expected, there are those who have disagreed with the CPCCA's mandate from the outset, criticizing it for what they believe to have been a far too parochial focus; and, predictably, there are those who have taken issue with the current report – or might still do so – either because it is not seen as going far enough in its recommendations or because it is perceived by them as having diluted the coalition's objectives with a perspective that lacks sufficient evidential support.

Nonetheless, in its entirety, and regardless of identifiable flaws that are inevitable in a text of this sort, the report has intrinsic merit and should provide at least an initial template – in what will hopefully be an ongoing exercise – for comprehensively addressing, and more effectively confronting, antisemitism in all of its possible manifestations, across Canada.

What stands out in the CPCCA's articulation of contemporary Jew hatred is its readiness to accept the precept that targeting the State of Israel with unwarranted opprobrium is an overt expression of what has come to be regarded as the "new" antisemitism and needs to be recognized as such and censured accordingly. In this regard, and more generally, the coalition has embraced the working definition of antisemitism, proposed by the European Union Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia (EUMC) in 2005, which continues to gain international traction as the accepted standard for categorizing and combating antisemitic sentiment, in both speech and action.

And while the CPCCA's inquiry's objectives were intentionally broad, it is apparent that it did tend to zone in on what are considered the more contentious sectors – among them our university campuses – where the "climate of antisemitism" has been seen to be worsening in recent years.

Addressing the campus problem is, of course, intrinsic to an initiative of this sort, but it is doubtful, given past and current experience, that university administrators will pay more than just cursory attention to one of the inquiry panel's principal recommendations: that they begin working together "to develop protocols and procedures for the reporting and pooling of information relating to antisemitic incidents on campus, as defined with reference to the EUMC Working Definition of Antisemitism" (my italics).

Sadly, when it comes to a trade-off between demonization and delegitimization of Israel and strict adherence to what flies under the all-embracing banner of freedom of speech, most doyens of academe seem to be locked in a mindset that prevents even rational discussion of a construct like the EUMC's characterization of antisemitism. Opening such an envelope would require a fundamental and courageous re-examination of what "free speech" really means and an acceptance of the idea that condemnation of Israel – the Jewish collectivity – is a violation of that hallowed freedom rather than an affirmation of it.

The Jewish apps keep coming

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

If you are itching to download a Jewish or Israeli app onto your iPhone or iPad, here are some to consider.

Alef-Bet Bullseye ($1.99): this game helps you master the Hebrew alphabet (and vowel combinations) without even realizing you're learning. When a voice utters "Gimel!" you are challenged to tap the corresponding letter on the screen. The faster you tap, the higher your score. And you can customize the game to drill you on the entire alphabet or just on the letters you find particularly troublesome. [http://bit.ly/jhapp10]

Jewish Meals ($1.99): mouth-watering photography and recipes for traditional (Honey Cake, Chopped Liver, Kneidlach) and non-traditional fare (Fruit Sushi, Aubergine Delight, Quinoa Salad). The interface (that looks even better on an iPad) lets you print and e-mail favourite recipes. I'm not convinced that you couldn't find comparable free recipes on the web, but people collect cookbooks, so why not cookbook apps, too? [http://bit.ly/jhapp11]

Facts on the Ground Map Project (free): is released by Americans for Peace Now. This app allows you to zoom in on a map that displays "settlement activity in the West Bank." You can customize the view to indicate the Green Line, the West Bank Barrier, settlements, outposts and municipal boundaries. [http://bit.ly/jhapp12]

iFree Gilad Shalit (free): this is a simple Hebrew-only app that greets you with the number of days, hours, minutes and seconds Gilad Schalit has been in captivity since he was kidnapped by Hamas in 2006. If you allow the app to access your location, you can click on a link that will insert an orange ribbon on a world map to indicate that you have not forgotten Schalit. [http://bit.ly/jhapp13]

Guess Who Is Jewish (99¢): How well honed is your Jewdar? This app puts your sixth sense to the test by pairing up personalities, one of whom is Jewish and one not. Some questions are ridiculously easy; others are surprisingly hard. Test yourself by guessing the Jew in these pairs:

(a) Jack Black or (b) Kofi Annan

(c) Leelee Sobieski or (d) Daniel Day Lewis

(e) Harrison Ford or (f) John Schneider

You'll find the answers below. [http://bit.ly/jhapp14]

iZman (free): it does a great job calculating the earliest and latest times to recite daily prayers. All you have to do is choose your city from the list that includes obvious locations like Jerusalem, New York and Ottawa. Unfortunately, it doesn't include Toronto or Montreal and there's no way to add them. At least iZman does tell you how late you can say the Shema if you find yourself in Riyadh. [http://bit.ly/jhapp15]

iLuach ($2.99): and that's why I was so happy to hear from Barry Bernstein of Thornhill, Ont., who told me about an application he wrote for the iPhone. The app "iLuach is a full feature perpetual Hebrew calendar. It shows all holidays, parashah, including full text, the complete Tanach, candlelighting times and zmanim (prayer times)." The city list is better but not perfect – it includes Montreal and Toronto but no Winnipeg (or Riyadh). With all the features it does have, iLuach is an excellent app. [http://bit.ly/jhapp16]

Students learn about prewar Jewish life in Poland

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Graduate students Hailey Dilman and Alexandria Fanjoy's participation in a three-week Holocaust education program to Poland taught them that the country is much more than a Jewish graveyard.

Both originally from Toronto, Dilman and Fanjoy were among 10 graduate and PhD students selected by the Auschwitz Jewish Center Foundation (AJCF) to take part in the fully subsidized program funded by private donors and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

In addition to visiting Polish concentration camps and hearing testimonies from Holocaust survivors, the program included visits to Krakow, Warsaw, Auschwitz, and Lodz to explore Poland's rich Jewish heritage, and meet with local Jewish and non-Jewish leaders to learn about prewar Jewish life and the Jewish community in Poland today.

Dilman, 25, who obtained her undergraduate degree from the University of Toronto and is currently enrolled at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem to pursue a master's degree in Jewish studies, said the trip was about more than the Holocaust.

"Our trip is... about allowing us to see Poland as a land of rich Jewish culture and long history in Poland itself... [and] to try to rise above certain stereotypes Jews and Poles hold of one another today, through an exploration of their past relations and their current relations," Dilman said.

She said that as a Jew, she experienced mixed feelings about Poland, "because in some senses, I see it as the land of ashes; a resting place for my nation that were murdered in the Holocaust."

But this experience taught her about a deeper connection Jews had with Poland and its people, Dilman added.

Fanjoy, 25, who obtained a master's degree from the Near Eastern and Judaic studies program at Brandeis University in May, said the trip forced her "to really examine the Holocaust and its impact on the Jewish community as well as the Polish community."

Fanjoy, who wrote a thesis titled, Mapping the Blindspot: Perpetrators, Shoah, and American Jewish Collective Memory, discovered that while there are many who are dedicated to preserving the memory of the Jews who lived in Poland pre-World War II, there are some who resent the memorial effort.

During a ceremony to commemorate the 70th anniversary of the 1941 Jedwabne pogrom – a massacre that claimed the lives of about 340 Jews – Fanjoy encountered locals who were defensive about being "painted with the brush of perpetrators."

"People kept staring us down, and coming up to us, and asking us why we were there, and telling their side of the story, and demanding that we not treat them as perpetrators, too," said Fanjoy, who converted to Judaism five years ago.

"I completely understood why they felt that way. But at the same time, I really reacted negatively to the fact that they weren't playing an active role in the memory of this event, and in fact, appeared to be actively against it."

She said it was this experience that helped her understand how the Holocaust impacted generations of Jews as well as non-Jews.

Dilman, on the other hand, "was incredibly touched" by the effort of some members of the Polish community "to remember the events... to learn from them, and to reach out and bridge gaps to the Jewish people."

She said the message that resonated with her most was that "although the pogrom was not perpetrated by most people living in the town now, that everyone in the town, no matter how young or old, are responsible for the memory of it."

Fanjoy said she was grateful for the opportunity to learn more about the Polish Jewish community of about 5,000 that still exists today.

"I think sometimes there's a perception that Jewish life here was gone as of 1946, and while of course it's not what it was... to ignore the Jewish presence here does the community a great disservice," said Fanjoy, who will begin her post as the Jewish student life manager for Hillel at the University of Western Ontario next month.

"There are many people here who are struggling to rebuild and reignite Jewish life here... and I think what they're doing is very admirable."

Delegates explore superheroes at youth convention

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Eastern Canada Region of United Synagogue Youth (ECRUSY), the high school affiliate of the United Synagogues of Conservative Judaism, held its four-day spring convention at Congregation Or Shalom in London, Ont.

ECRUSY members from all regional chapters attended programs for Kadima (grades 5 to 7) and USY (grades 8 to12).

The theme of the convention was "Superheroes." Delegates explored the image and characteristics of superheroes and discussed Jewish influences in comic books and popular culture.

Convention co-chairs Alannah Lax-Vanek from Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, Toronto, and Emily Anzarouth from Agudath Israel Congregation, Ottawa, organized the fun, educational and service-oriented programs at the event.

Delegates went on a trip to East Park Gardens, where they participated in go-karting, rock climbing, bumper cars and arcade games.

Jonah Eisen, of Beth David, was elected president of the 2011-12 ECRUSY regional executive board. Other positions elected were Israel affairs vice-president Michaela Sadinsky, of Agudath Israel; religion/ education vice-president Ben Levine, of Beth David; social action/ tikkun olam vice-president Noa Zaifman, of Congregation Or Shalom; membership/ Kadima vice-president Samantha Roth, of Beth David; communications vice-president Jake Pascoe, also of Beth David.

The Most Improved Chapter Award went to Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton, while Chapter of the Year went to Beth David Synagogue in Toronto. Additional awards went to Agudath Israel for social programming and social action; Beth Jacob for religion/ education programming and to Beth David for Israel programming and communications.

The Sharon Cole Memorial Scholarship was awarded to Joshua Seed of Beth David for his service to ECRUSY.

The next convention takes place at the end of the August. For more information about USY, visit www.ecrusy.org or the Facebook fan page "ECRUSY: Canadians Do It Best."

בתור מי שמבלה חלק לא קטן מחייו על מטוסים, החלטתי לשתף אתכם מפעם לפעם בהתרשמויות קטנות ממקומות רחוקים- לא ממש מדור תיירות, אלא הדברים הקטנים שגורמים לך לעצור לרגע ולהניד לעצמך: ואללה, כמה שהם שונים.

"סיפור אהבה ארץ ישראלי"

ההצגה תגיע לטורונטו ביום חמישי, ה- 15 בספטמבר, לאולם בית הספר ביאליק ב 7:30 בערב ואני מציע שתסמנו לכם את התאריך. כרטיסים, בחסות תכנית המפגש והבית הישראלי- אצל תמי ב 7647817 905

כשסיימנו את בית הספר התיכון בשנות הששים- אינני זוכר אפילו רגע אחד שבו אני או חברי לכיתה דאגנו שלא תהיה לנו עבודה. היה ברור שמי שהולך לאוניברסיטה, ואפילו מי שמסתפק בתיכון, ולבטח מי שלמד מקצוע- כולם יעבדו.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Group builds bridges through film and dialogue

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Thirty college and university students from Israel, Palestine and Canada arrived in Vancouver July 7 with one thing on their minds: peace. They came for a summer filmmaking program organized by Peace It Together, a non-profit organization that aims to build trust, mutual respect and understanding through dialogue. This is the third program of its kind for Peace It Together and by the time the students return home on August 4 they will take with them 10 short films that they will have made about how the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and its inherent intolerance and violence impacts their lives.

That dialogue is crucial because Israeli and Palestinian youth tend to grow up without significant interaction. In a press release, PIT noted that "the narratives they are exposed to in school and via their local media are one-sided and almost exclusively perpetuate the conflict." PIT believes that given the opportunity to hear each other's stories, work with their stated 'enemies' and create a new paradigm, the cycle of violence will be less likely to continue and youth will be more likely to work together towards peace and reconciliation.

The students were selected through connections that Peace It Together's partner organization, the Peace Research Institute in the Middle East, has through universities, said Reena Lazar, PITs executive director. "We were looking for a diverse group of people who were committed to doing peace work and who are articulate and creative," she added. The group is comprised of 10 Jewish Israelis, 10 Palestinians and 10 Canadians, with an even split of men and women. The Canadian students paid up to $2,500 for the program, while those who could afford it among the Israelis and Palestinians were asked to pay $500 for the almost month-long program that includes food, accommodation and daily activities.

Peace It Together receives the bulk of its funding from the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, but is also supported by community donors, private foundations and community foundations.

"Our total operating costs are about $400,000 a year for the program, public engagement and the distribution of the films," Lazar said. PIT owns some of its filmmaking equipment, loans items from the BC film industry and through a partnership with the University of British Columbia, is able to procure filmmaking equipment from the institution.

Prior to leaving the Middle East, the Israelis and Palestinians met as a group and screened films made in previous years. "We wanted them to start thinking about what kinds of films they would create, that they would later show to their communities," she said. "We're looking to see how they can make a difference through their films, because the idea is to reach as many people as possible, to inspire others to build peace and to increase the number of people engaged in peace building."

Lazar and her team have received positive feedback from many viewers who have seen films made in previous years. "They tell us how powerful and inspiring the films are, because they show the human side of the conflict, which viewers otherwise would not see." Past participants have also noted that PIT has made a significant difference in their lives, especially in how they view "the other side."

"I saw four past participants when I was in Israel in April and they were talking like brothers," Lazar said. "They were talking about the conflict, but they were taking responsibility for their own sides' actions rather than pointing fingers at what the other side was doing wrong. To me, that's a very strong indication of emotional maturity and a real step forward."

To see updates on this year's program and view films from previous programs, visit PIT's website, www.peaceittogether.com.

A subject rarely explored by western journalists

Jonathan Kay's July 19 column in the National Post, "Once again, the Jewish question," is rare in western journalism in getting to the heart of the current impasse in the "peace process" between Palestinians and Israelis.

Drawing on conversations with Palestinians in Ramallah during his recent visit, Kay began by contrasting the positive economic improvements that have occurred in the West Bank in the past few years (aided by co-operation with Israel) with their negative attitudes about there being no end in sight to Israeli occupation. On the latter issue, Kay seemed to concur when he wrote: "The fact that Israel keeps expanding settlements, even as it's blaming the Palestinians for undermining peace talks, obviously doesn't help [to counter this impression]."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

After mentioning other familiar Palestinian complaints, such as the impact the security fence has on their lives (even as it has helped to save Israelis, Arab and Jew alike, from terrorist attacks), Kay turned to the other side of the equation. In so doing, he touched on a crucial subject rarely explored by western journalists – Palestinian attitudes toward accepting Israel as the homeland of the Jewish people.

Kay observed: "When I put the proposition to people in Ramallah, I couldn't find anyone who'd agree." Indeed, what Kay found was indignation at the very idea of recognizing Israel as the Jewish state. It's a "racist" and "evil" notion, insisted Mahmoud Labadi (whom Kay described as "a charismatic, old-guard PA apparatchik").

Yasser Arafat insisted even to former president Bill Clinton that Israel has no historical connection to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem. [RNS photo]

Kay continued: "Then, [Labadi] launched himself into the realm of fantasy by claiming that the entire Jewish historical claim to Jerusalem's core is bogus, because no Jewish temple ever existed in the area.

"Palestinian leaders have fallen back on this insulting conspiracy theory for years. It's become part of Fatah lore. But this was the first time I'd been assailed by it in person, and I was somewhat shocked by the experience."

Yet, it is this very experience that Israelis – cognizant of Palestinian statements, media reports, mosque sermons, etc. – are exposed to daily. And this includes, significantly, the broad middle of Israeli society, which in principle favours a two-state solution and is prepared for major territorial compromise to achieve it. That is, except for one critical fact: they don't believe there's a reliable partner on the Palestinian side. They haven't since former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat in late 2000 insisted that the Jews have no historical attachments to Jerusalem including, foremost, to the Western Wall (which in any event he claimed is in Nablus). The years of violence that Arafat subsequently unleashed against the same Israelis who were prepared to take "risks" for peace only reinforced this sense of betrayal and disillusionment.

Kay correctly referred to Arafat's "crackpot history," which unfortunately is widespread among Palestinian (and Arab) society, and represents an attempt "to strip Israel of its historical identity as the homeland for the Jewish people." This rejection of Jewish sovereign rights (a position shared by current PA President Mahmoud Abbas) is also connected, as Kay observed, to the insistence that Palestinian refugees and descendants have a "right" to return to present-day Israel.

Kay's 1,800-word article goes into far richer detail than can be conveyed here about the anti-Israel and anti-Jewish conspiracy theories that pose a huge conceptual block to the possibility of progress on the peace front.

As this column has argued on several occasions, while most western journalists focus almost entirely on the issue of settlements as "an obstacle to peace," they fail to see that as difficult a subject this is, it is resolvable not only in principle but in fact. What is a far greater deal-breaker, however, is what Kay discusses – an attitude deeply immersed in the denial of Jewish history and peoplehood. To such a conceptual knot there may be no remedy, at least none in the foreseeable future, where the rise of Islamic extremism in the broader region only makes matters worse.

JNF restructuring Prairies operations

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Change is afoot at the Jewish National Fund office in Winnipeg.

They have bid farewell to Prairies shaliach Erez Rotem and development co-ordinator Jacqueline Freedman, and are interviewing candidates for the new role of executive director.

"We think that there are areas that we are not reaching. Going with a full-time executive director can help us increase awareness of the JNF and our revenues," says Joe Rabinovitch, executive vice-president of JNF Canada.

"In future, shlichim will be involved only in fundraising," he said.

The shaliach in Winnipeg traditionally was also responsible for Saskatchewan and Alberta. Under the reorganization, Rabinovitch said, Alberta will have its own JNF executive director.

"There are a lot of things going on between Israel and Manitoba and we are continuing to work on them," says Rabinovitch, who had nothing but praise for the work of Rotem and Freedman (who Rotem hired in January 2009, and who is leaving her position at the end of July for personal reasons).

"Erez and Jacqueline were wonderful to work with," says Mel Lazareck, president of JNF Winnipeg for the past four years. "My wife and I had met Erez and his family in Israel before they came to Canada. We got along very well with him. He and his wife are lovely people."

Gourmet cookie book provides a peek into the past

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Reading cookbooks is one of my favourite ways to relax and explore the wonderful world of food. I have cookbooks piled up in nearly every room of my house, and summertime provides me with some leisure time to catch up on my reading. One advantage of browsing through cookbooks is that you can read a page or two and then put down the book until you have a few minutes to pick it up again and continue your culinary journey.

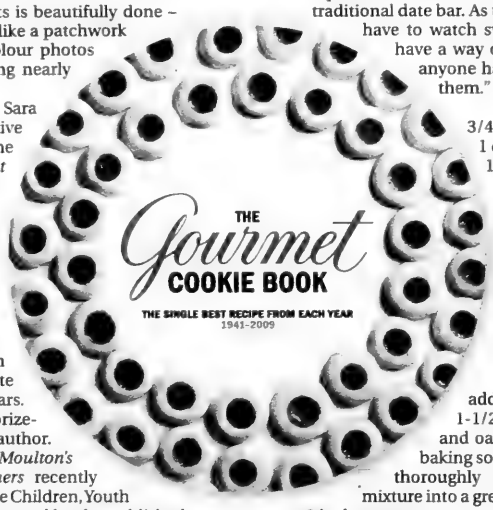
Baking books are always a fun read, and I love to fantasize about nibbling on all sorts of scrumptious sweets, minus the caloric consequences, as I peruse the pages, deciding what to bake.

One of my favourite finds is the Gourmet Cookie Book: The Single Best Recipe from Each Year – 1941-2009 (Houghton Mifflin Harcourt). It features the best cookie recipe from each year of Gourmet magazine's existence. Not only is this a fabulous collection of cookie recipes, it also provides a peek into the past. This book would not have been possible without Gourmet's devoted readers, who sent in their favourite cookie recipes and their comments for so many years.

Printed exactly as they originally appeared in the magazine – with abundant tips from Gourmet's test kitchen and headnotes describing their cultural context – the recipes present a fascinating bite-by-bite history of how our appetites evolved.

The table of contents is beautifully done – it was designed to look like a patchwork quilt, with gorgeous colour photos of each recipe, spanning nearly seven decades.

I was thrilled when Sara Moulton, the executive chef for 23 years of the now defunct Gourmet magazine, came to my home several months ago to talk about some of the cookbook's highlights. We sat around my dining room table and shared cookies and conversation.



Moulton has been one of my favourite celebrity chefs for years. She is a TV host and prize-winning cookbook author. Her latest book, Sara Moulton's Everyday Family Dinners recently won an IACP award in the Children, Youth and Family category for cookbooks published in 2010. I've always loved watching her cooking shows on the Food Network and often watch her guest appearances on TV on Good Morning America.

Moulton is very down to earth, and we shared many stories about our families. She's married to "a nice Jewish boy from Detroit" and is the mother of Sam and Ruthie, who are in their 20s. Moulton prepares family meals five nights a week and the family eats together. To save time, she orders her groceries online, buying lots of organic and local foods.

Moulton explained that The Gourmet Cookie Book is actually a history of cookies, and the language is exactly as it was written. "People knew how to cook and life was simpler back then. In the '80s, recipes became much more detailed, and ingredients and instructions became more complicated. Pistachios and macadamia nuts became mainstream items at the supermarket, and the '90s brought designer chocolate to the forefront. For example, the Mocha Cookies (see recipe below) call for chocolate, chocolate chips and espresso powder. In 2000, there were more cookies in Gourmet magazine than in the first whole decade!"

Gourmet closed its doors in October 2010 and the cookbook was produced to "keep the brand alive."

Moulton explained, "Cookies are the first thing you learn to make with your mom." The recipes in the Gourmet Cookie Book are ideal to make with your children as a fun project, summertime or any time of year.

Cookies first baked with mom

Yes, you'll have to turn on your oven, even wash a few dishes – but it will be worth it. A just-baked cookie, still warm from the oven, has a soothing scent and is true comfort food. It's one of the easiest ways to say, "I love you."

APRICOT CHEWS (September 1966)

In the September 1966 issue, the editors of Gourmet published this much-improved version of a traditional date bar. As the editors noted, "You have to watch sweets like these. They have a way of disappearing before anyone has had a chance to eat them."

3/4 cup butter
1 cup brown sugar
1 1/2 cups each of flour and oatmeal
1 tsp. baking soda
3/4 lb. dried apricots
1 cup water
3/4 cup sugar
1 tbsp. apricot liqueur
1/4 cup grated coconut (optional)

Melt 3/4 cup butter; add 1 cup brown sugar, 1-1/2 cups each of flour and oatmeal, and 1 teaspoon baking soda. Mix the ingredients thoroughly and press half the mixture into a greased baking pan about 9 inches square.

In a saucepan, simmer 3/4 pound dried apricots with 1 cup water and 3/4 cup sugar for 30 minutes, or until the apricots are soft. Add 1 tablespoon apricot liqueur after the mixture has been cooking for 20 minutes.

Spoon the apricots over the crumb mixture in the baking pan, sprinkle them with 1/4 cup grated coconut, if desired, and cover them with the rest of the crumbs.

Bake the mixture in a moderate oven (350 F) for 25 to 30 minutes, or until it is golden. Cut the mixture into squares while it is still warm and turn out the chews from the pan when they are cold and set. Makes 3 dozen squares.

Recipe Notes:
- For the best flavour and colour, use California dried apricots.
- Use apricot brandy.
- Puree the apricots in a food processor after cooking.
- Grease the baking pan with butter, line it with two criss-crossed sheets of foil, and then butter the foil.
- Make 36 squares by cutting the bars into 6 rows each lengthwise and crosswise.

MOCHA COOKIES
(October 1990)

The '90s were the chocolate decade in America. This recipe – from the Bakery on Melrose Avenue in Los Angeles – has no subtlety: It revels in its rich chocolate decadence. The fact that it is reasonably easy to put together is a bonus. You begin with melted chocolate, a ton of chocolate chips and a spot of espresso powder – and you end up with a cookie that everybody adores. Make these cookies once, and you'll be making them for the rest of your life.

4 oz. unsweetened chocolate, chopped
3 cups semisweet chocolate chips
1 stick (1/2 cup) unsalted butter, cut into bits
1/2 cup all-purpose flour
1/2 tsp. double-acting baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
4 large eggs, at room temperature
1 1/2 cups sugar
1 1/2 tbsp. instant espresso powder (see Recipe Notes, below)
2 tsp. vanilla

In a metal bowl set over a saucepan of simmering water, melt the unsweetened chocolate, 1-1/2 cups of the chocolate chips and the butter, stirring until the mixture is smooth, and remove the bowl from the heat.

In a small bowl, stir together the flour, baking powder and salt.

In a bowl, beat the eggs with the sugar until the mixture is thick and pale, and beat in the espresso powder and the vanilla. Fold the chocolate mixture into the egg mixture, fold in the flour mixture, and stir in the remaining 1-1/2 cups chocolate chips. Let the batter stand for 15 minutes.

Drop the batter by heaping tablespoons onto baking sheets lined with parchment paper and bake the cookies in the middle of a preheated 350-degree oven for 8 to 10 minutes, or until they are puffed and shiny and cracked on top.

Let the cookies cool on the baking sheets, transfer them to racks and let cool completely. Makes about 3 dozen cookies.

Recipe Notes:
- Err on the side of underbaking these cookies. They are meant to be soft and rich.
- Cool for 1 minute on the baking sheet before transferring the cookies to racks.
- Insider Info: No espresso powder? Substitute fine ground regular coffee.

Experience more 'flow' in your life

"Flow" is a word that often floats around in the coaching world. There is even a wonderful book devoted to it, called Flow: The Psychology of Optimal Experience by Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi.

This book is about how one of the most valuable experiences that a person can have is being in "flow," completely absorbed in the experience he or she is involved in. So we hear about how this happens for a singer or a musician when he is swept away by music, or a painter when she is really lost and immersed in a painting, or a tennis player completely focused and in "flow" during an exciting match. It happens when we're in love, when we're in an exciting conversation, or involved in a fun or meaningful activity with our children. It is a very fulfilling state, and one that we want to make happen more often.

Life Coach Corner

And then there's just being "in the flow" of your life. I am on a list through which Oprah Winfrey sends me newsletters about upcoming shows on her television network, OWN, and I suspect it is a list that many people are on. One of my best friends, Sari, however, seems to be on an extra special mailing list that Oprah sends out to her VIP readers and friends, and she recently started sending me these letters that Oprah writes to her "special friends"!

So the inside scoop is that Oprah has taken up swimming lessons and moved beyond her amateur dog paddle to the some bona fide and very expert swim strokes. She writes: "Over a year ago, I pulled a picture from O Magazine of a woman gliding through water. It was such a striking image of freedom and possibility I put it on my vision board. Today, when I finished my swimming lesson, I passed the vision board on the table where it's been – since 2009. I had an 'aha' moment. I had just become that woman, gliding through the water! For years, I've been a challenged swimmer, afraid of the water and fighting it. Today, I learned to move with the flow."

So how can you learn to move with the flow and glide along like that picture of the swimmer in O Magazine? Well, begin by relaxing and getting out of your own way. Move toward what you want by paying attention to your dreams and goals and hopes, And as Linda Page and David Rock write in their book Coaching with the Brain In Mind, "it matters what we pay attention to." Say the authors: "Remember, we get more of what we pay attention to. To pay constant attention to fears, regrets, worries or vengeful thoughts means that we will increase these undesirable aspects in our lives."

According to Page and Rock, "people need to know what they are good at (their signature strengths) and then organize their lives around those strengths, and honour and use them more."

In order to experience more "flow," start by identifying where you shine. Try to stay aligned with your passions, pay attention to what you want – not what you don't want – and more of what you want will be available to you. This will become your chance to lose yourself in the "flow" of what you love to do, and then more happiness and fulfilment will become available to you. It really does work – just ask Oprah!

FIRST WEDDING

B'nai Shalom Congregation of Halton and Peel marked a milestone on July 3, when it celebrated its first wedding. Stuart Tisnower, 43, and Belinda Kligman, 39, daughter of shul president Jack Kligman, were the first members to wed since the congregation's establishment in 2003. B'nai Shalom, an egalitarian, Conservative congregation that serves 24 families and runs out of a rented room at the Monte Carlo Inn in Oakville, Ont., celebrated its first bar mitzvah in 2008, and its first baby-naming ceremony in 2010.

Jewish leaders reject Norway killer's pro-Zionism

Toby Axelrod
JTA

BERLIN — The confessed perpetrator in the attack in Norway that killed as many as 98 people espoused a right-wing philosophy against Islam that also purports to be pro-Zionist.

Anders Behring Breivik is charged with detonating a car bomb outside Oslo's government headquarters, which houses the office of Norwegian Prime Minister Jens Stoltenberg, and of shooting and killing at least 85 mostly young people at a political summer camp on nearby Utoya Island. The July 22 massacre reportedly was the worst attack in Norway since the end of World War II.

In numerous online postings, including a manifesto published on the day of the attacks, Breivik promoted the Vienna School or Crusader Nationalism philosophy, a mishmash of anti-modern principles that also calls for "the deportation of all Muslims from Europe" as well as from "the West Bank and the Gaza Strip."

According to the manifesto, titled 2083: A European Declaration of Independence and published under the pseudonym Andrew Berwick, the Vienna School supports "pro-Zionism/Israeli nationalism."

Breivik listed numerous European Freedom Parties and neo-Nazi parties as potential allies because of their anti-immigrant, anti-Muslim stance, and mentioned that right-wing populists like Dutch politician Geert Wilders "have to condemn us at this point, which is fine. It is after all essential that they protect their reputational shields."

European right-populist parties increasingly have been waving the flag of friendship with Israel, as well as expressing vehement opposition to Europe's multicultural society.

In postings on the website Document.no that appear to be by Breivik, the poster pondered whether one could "accept the moderate Nazis as long as they distance themselves" from the extermination of the Jews.

Stephan Kramer, general secretary of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, told JTA that "in the recent years we have witnessed the phenomenon of radical rightists proclaiming their sympathy for Jews and their support for Israel, also in Germany," adding that "in many cases, it is clear that this is no more than a PR manoeuvre to create an air of respectability."

"Whatever 'support' for Israel Anders Behring Breivik may have had in his abominable mind, it is not any kind of support we want," Kramer said.

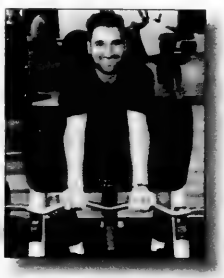
One day after the attack, members of Norway's small Jewish community gathered at the Synagogue of Oslo to pray for the survivors. "We also pray that the authorities will be less naive on security issues and threats," businessman Erwin Kohn, newly elected head of the 750-member Jewish community, said in a telephone interview from Oslo. On the reports about Breivik's online postings, he offered his concerns. "You have many others who are in the same ballpark, being scared of multiculturalism," Kohn said, adding that Breivik's alleged pro-Zionism is a sham. "We don't need such friends."

Serge Cwajgenbaum, secretary general of the European Jewish Congress, in a call from France said that Breivik "is not pro-Israel – he is anti-Muslim. "It is a national catastrophe," he said, "and we share the sadness of the sorrow of the families."

Meanwhile, Israel on Saturday night condemned the attacks in Oslo. Israeli President Shimon Peres called the king of Norway, Harald V, to express condolences. "Your country is a symbol of peace and freedom. In Israel we followed the events over the weekend in Norway and the attack on innocent civilians broke our hearts. It is a painful tragedy that touches every human being. We send our condolences to the families that lost their loved ones and a speedy recovery to the wounded. Israel is willing to assist in whatever is needed." Kohn noted that antisemitism in the country remains a serious problem. A recent study of 7,000 Norwegian teens showed that more than half of youth of all backgrounds, whether Christian or Muslim, use the word "Jew" as an expletive.

New Beit Halochem Centre in the South for Israel's Disabled Veterans

Three years after construction began, the Beit Halochem Centre in Beer Sheva opened its doors to over 3,200 disabled members and their families living in southern Israel. Shimon Ohana is just one of our brave heroes who will benefit from our new Centre; here is his story ...



At 18, I followed in my father's footsteps and chose to do my military service as a border policeman. Within six weeks, my life changed forever.

While on duty in a Jerusalem neighborhood, shooting began from nearby Baet Jalah village. Bullets punctured my heart and vital organs, rupturing my spleen, liver and intestines. I lay unconscious.

The ambulance arrived with a doctor who tried to save me by opening my chest and stitching my heart on the spot. I lost a lot of blood and was declared clinically dead.

While they were putting me into a body bag, the doctor miraculously discovered a faint pulse and rushed me to the hospital. Hovering between life and death for 21 days, I received 138 blood transfusions.

Of that fateful day, I only remember being put into the body bag. I was just not ready to die so young.

My first time at Beit Halochem, I stood at the swimming pool, embarrassed to take off my shirt revealing my scar-covered body. Around me were people without limbs, burned, blind — but happy to be alive. This gave me the strength I needed to start living again.

Now my life has changed once again as I am finally able to frequent Beit Halochem in Beer Sheva where I receive therapy, swim, work out, play tennis and ping pong. Most importantly it has become my second home, a place where I am comfortable and can socialize with other wounded veterans.

I want to personally thank you for funding the Beit Halochem Centre in Beer Sheva. We need you and appreciate your support.

Unfortunately, in 2010, 670 newly wounded joined Beit Halochem.

Please support the 51,000 Disabled Israeli Veterans and Victims of Terror.

Israeli experiment lands with final shuttle

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

When the space shuttle Atlantis touched down in Cape Canaveral, Fla., after its final voyage last week, it returned with three Israeli experiments.

After the landing, crews at NASA's Kennedy Space Center unloaded the Israeli scientific payloads, which included microgravity experiments on telomeres – DNA sequences that protect chromosomes from erosion – another study on bone cells, and one on water purification.

All three experiments were organized by Israel's Fisher Institute for Strategic Air and Space Studies, a nonprofit organization that receives funding from the Israeli Ministry of Science and has worked with NASA and other space agencies to bring Israeli experiments into space.

Atlantis' crew retrieved the bone cell study – a joint project between the institute and Hebrew University – from the International Space Station after it had been left behind by the space shuttle Endeavour on NASA's penultimate May shuttle mission. It was the first time an Israeli experiment had been kept on board the station.

NASA's shuttle program was mothballed after Atlantis' last mission to the ISS.

The institute posits that its telomere experiment might lead to better ways of dealing "with cellular aging processes and their harmful products," the Institute said in a statement.

The telomere study is being done in co-operation with Dr. Elizabeth Blackburn, winner of the 2009 Nobel Prize in Physiology for her work on telomeres and DNA.

Dr. Eran Schenker, head of the Fisher Institute's Aerospace Medicine Research Center, was at the shuttle landing in Florida last week to supervise the retrieval and analysis of the Israeli experiments and help transfer them to partner laboratories worldwide waiting to analyze the data collected in space.

Speaking to The CJN from Florida last week, Schenker said he didn't regard the end of the shuttle program as an obstacle for future Israeli-American space ventures. Rather, he said the future now lies with emergent "commercial" space programs in the United States.

He said results from the telomere experiment should be published in about one year.

Beyond that, Schenker confirmed that Israel had already secured a spot on an upcoming 2012 Russian mission to the ISS and was looking forward to continued partnerships with space agencies around the world.

In a statement, Brig. Gen. (Res.) Asaf Agmon, head of the Fisher Institute, said he attached "great importance" to Israel's participation in experiments conducted in space.

"As the final shuttle lands, it is a nice summary to Israeli activity in the shuttle program, to be bringing back an experiment which has been circling the Earth."

Agmon said the results of the water purification experiment, done in partnership with the Strauss Group, Israel's second-largest food and beverage company, could potentially "affect all human life all over the globe.

"The research tests a new water purification technology under zero gravity in space. [It] is a polymer-based bio-medical technology designed to purify drinking water by effectively removing bacteria and viruses," he said.

Israel is one of nine countries with space-launch capability. The others are the United States, Russia, Ukraine, France, the United Kingdom, Japan, China, India and Iran.

Ilan Ramon, the first Israeli astronaut, perished along with the rest of the space shuttle Columbia crew when the craft exploded on re-entry from orbit on Feb. 1, 2003.

Knesset rejects NGO inquiries

Israel's Knesset voted down a bill that would have established inquiries into human rights groups. The bill was defeated last week by a vote of 57 to 28. Two members of the governing coalition parties, Danny Danon of Likud and Faina Kirschenbaum of Yisrael Beitenu, sponsored the bill. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who heads the Likud Party, opposed the measure. Many Diaspora Jewish groups had pressed the Knesset to reject the bill. Netanyahu was already being criticized by Jewish groups for supporting a bill that allows people who live in the West Bank to sue those who call for a boycott of goods made in West Bank Jewish communities.

Flotilla participants deported

The activists aboard the lone Gaza-bound flotilla ship, intercepted by Israel, were deported. Some 15 activists, journalists and crew members were deported last Wednesday, a day after the French-flagged Dignity al-Karama was boarded by Israeli commandos near Gaza waters and towed to Israel's Ashdod port. One activist was an Israeli journalist and was not deported. The ship reportedly had declared a port in Egypt as its final destination in order to be able to leave Greek waters. At least seven other flotilla ships were detained and remain in Greek ports for safety violations. After boarding the ship, Israeli troops checked the condition of the passengers and offered them food and drink, according to the Israel Defence Forces. The deportees could be denied entrance to Israel for the next 10 years.

Paul Simon performs

American music legend Paul Simon performed at the Ramat Gan Stadium last Thursday. It was his third show in Israel. The 70-year-old singer and songwriter – once half of the folk duo Simon and Garfunkel – told journalists that he brought no political messages and that, as an artist, his sole aim was to play and sing the best he could. Simon received a shofar at a press conference the day before the concert.

Device gives a window into workings of the brain

Chebat, 32, who grew up in Montreal, heard about Amedi's research while working on his doctorate at Université de Montréal, at the school of optometry in neuropsychology.

"I was working with a different sensory substitution device, and I was interested in navigation in blind people using sensory substitution," said Chebat, an Azrieli post-doctoral fellow in the department of medical neurobiology at Hebrew U. "I wanted to continue exploring this fascinating topic of sensory substitution and brain plasticity after finishing my PhD [in 2010]. I had heard of the amazing research Dr. Amir Amedi had been doing... and I quickly realized that this dynamic and creative lab was the very best place in the world for me to pursue my scientific aspirations and ambitions as a researcher.

"Israeli universities are reputed to be on the cutting edge of science and constantly searching to apply this science to everyday life."

Chebat – along with other members of Amedi's team – demonstrated how to use the Yes-Eye-Cane at the recent Israeli Presidential Conference in Jerusalem. The device was unveiled as part of a larger exhibition presented by Yissum, the technology transfer arm of Hebrew U.

"Dr. Amedi's promising invention can endow visually impaired people with the freedom to freely navigate in their surroundings without unintentionally bumping into or touching other people and thus has the potential to significantly enhance their quality of life," said Yaacov Michlin, CEO of Yissum. So, here's how it works:

Users point the hand-held unit, which emits an invisible focused beam, in the direction they are walking. The cane incorporates several sensors that estimate the distance between the user and the object it is pointed at. That information is then relayed to the user by a series of vibrations, allowing the blind person to reconstruct an accurate image of the surroundings and navigate safely.

The virtual cane is easy to carry, can function for up to 12 hours and is easy to charge. It is also highly intuitive, and a user can learn to handle it within just a few minutes.

Scientifically, the device has given researchers a window into the workings of the brain.

"The amazing thing about these devices is how the brain of someone who is born blind reacts to them. The visual parts of the brain treat this information as if it were real vision coming from the eyes," said Chebat.

There are nearly 200 million visually impaired people globally, 40 million of whom are legally blind. According to the National Coalition for Vision Health, there are 278,000 Canadians who are visually impaired and 108,000 who are legally blind.

The Yes-Eye-Cane device is designed for people "who are completely blind from birth, people who became blind later in life, and people with low vision," said Chebat. "The low cost of the device (about $30 Cdn) makes it affordable to everyone and it is Dr. Amedi's dream to be able to distribute this device to all blind people in Israel who would like to use it, and eventually in the world."

Yad Vashem school fosters remembrance and knowledge

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — The International School for Holocaust Studies at Yad Vashem is a beacon of remembrance and a disseminator of knowledge.

Through its professional development seminars for Israeli and foreign teachers, as well as its programs for youth and Israeli soldiers, the school performs two vital tasks.

While preserving the darkest chapter in the annals of the Jewish people, it combats the universal scourge of antisemitism, the wellspring of the Holocaust.

"We're trying to create a network of educators dedicated to telling the story of the Holocaust," explained Ephraim Kaye, who has headed the school's International Seminars for Educators department since 1993. "Our objective is to keep the memory alive."

"It's about education, education and education," said Joe Gottdenker, a Toronto-based Holocaust survivor, businessman and vice chairman of the board of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, which is officially known as the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority.

Nestled on a wooded ridge in the green hills of Israel's capital, the school is an integral component of Yad Vashem, which has been dedicated to commemorating and documenting the Shoah since 1953.

The school has brought about 3,000 educators to Israel since the launch of the teacher training program 16 years ago.

Interestingly enough, most of the teachers who have taken courses have been non-Jews, while a few have been Arabs from Israel, the West Bank, Jordan and Morocco.

Last year, the school hosted foreign delegations from as far away as China and Argentina.

The Chinese delegation of 22 educators, the first group from China to be invited by Yad Vashem, came from Beijing, Shanghai, Nanjing, Shang Dong and Kaifeng and included university department heads, a high school principal and the translator of Amos Oz's novels into Chinese.

The 40 Argentines, on the other hand, were recruited from the country's 23 provinces.

Working on the assumption that education fosters tolerance and builds a resistance to racial, ethnic and religious hatred, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, with executive director Yaron Ashkenazi at its helm, has sent more than 100 educators to the school in the past five years.

A well-oiled and superbly managed model of its kind, the school supplanted a small and rather obscure department of education; said Avner Shalev, chair of Yad Vashem.

"We had to change our priorities," he stated, suggesting that education is Yad Vashem's chief priority today. "We needed to deal with the Holocaust systematically and thoroughly."

According to Shalev, interest in the Holocaust has grown immensely in recent years, particularly in Europe. "There is a feeling that the Holocaust is an integral part of their history and culture," he said, adding that more and more European schools now offer courses on the Holocaust.

Ephraim Kaye

In Israel, where Holocaust education became compulsory in schools only in the 1980s, Israeli youth were in the forefront of generating nation-wide interest in the Holocaust, he observed.

At the International School for Holocaust Studies, seminars are led by experts in Holocaust education, scholarship and research, and are built on three major pillars: academic, pedagogical and experiential.

The academic component is on the history and culture of Jewish communities in the interwar period.

The pedagogical aspect provides participants with the means to translate academic content into suitable pedagogical materials.

The experiential segment puts a human face on the Holocaust, enabling teachers to meet survivors.

"We want to shed light on the human spirit of survivors," said Kaye.

"We have to teach the Holocaust as a human story," noted Shulamit Imber, the school's pedagogical director. "We have to rescue individuals from the pile of bodies. The victims had names, identities and spiritual lives."

And while the Holocaust reinforces an enduring "Never Again" message that Israel promotes, the Holocaust should not be used exclusively to build Jewish identity, she warned.

In a lecture to Canadian journalists invited to Israel on a study tour by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, Imber said that an interdisciplinary approach best conveys the magnitude and complexity of the Holocaust. In an aside, she added that age-related teaching materials are of the utmost importance in reaching hearts and minds.

Bob Rozett, a historian and the director of Yad Vashem's library, observed that the Holocaust has become the avenue of choice in understanding the concept of evil.

Regrettably, a competition for victimization has broken out, resulting in the "politicization" of the Holocaust.

"People are using the Holocaust to frame their own tragedies," he said, citing the Irish and the potato famine and the Ukrainians and Joseph Stalin's collectivization campaign.

Some scholars are placing the Holocaust within the wider context of genocide and attempting "to flatten it out," said Rozett. "This is a new thing."

Yad Vashem's library, consisting of 154,000 titles in more than 50 languages, is the world's largest repository of Holocaust literature.

"We try to collect everything, from great scholarly works to Holocaust denial screeds. I buy everything. I have all kinds of stuff. I collect."

In his view, the five best books on the Holocaust are, in ascending order, Nazi Germany and the Jews by Saul Friedlander; Ordinary Men by Christopher Browning; The Jews of Warsaw, 1939-1943 by Yisrael Gutman; If This Is Man by Primo Levi, and The Lost by Daniel Mendelsohn.

Kaye recommends, among other works, Raul Hilberg's The Destruction of European Jews, Eberhard Jackel's Hitler in History and Omer Bartov's Hitler's Army, Soldiers, Nazis and War in the Third Reich.

Yad Vashem currently invests close to 20 per cent of its annual budget to digitize its gigantic mountain of archives, reported Michael Lieber, the chief information officer.

"Everything here goes digital," he said, referring to Yad Vashem's 138 million pages of documentation, thousands of films, 400,000 photographs and 102,000 survivor testimonies.

Noting that Yad Vashem uses social media sites such as Facebook and Twitter to publicize its mission, he said, "The new generation is getting information in different ways. We're trying to plug into this audience."

Shalev admitted that Yad Vashem embarked on computerization a little late. "We were not into this process until the start of the 1990s."

But Yad Vashem.org received 11 million visitors last year, Lieber pointed out.

The major challenge facing Yad Vashem today, Shalev said, is to build better accessibility to its bank of data bases so that information about the Holocaust reaches the greatest number of people throughout Israel and the world.

Winehouse family 'bereft' at singer's death

FA

LONDON — The family of troubled singing star Amy Winehouse, who was found dead in her London home, has asked for privacy to grieve.

Winehouse, 27, a five-time Grammy winner who was admired by music critics and beloved by celebrities, was plagued by drug and alcohol addiction, but officials at this point are saying her death is "unexplained." An autopsy to determine the cause will be performed early this week. She was found in her apartment last Saturday.

"Our family has been left bereft by the loss of Amy, a wonderful daughter, sister, niece," read a statement from the family. "She leaves a gaping hole in our lives. We are coming together to remember her and we would appreciate some privacy and space at this terrible time."

Winehouse's father, Mitch, returned to London immediately from New York, where he was performing.

"The bad girl with the pin-up tattoos, soul style and Marilyn Monroe mole piercing was born to Mitchell and Janis, a Jewish couple in north London," according to a report in Moment Magazine. "Not everyone is surprised to hear that Winehouse is Jewish. Referencing her Semitic-looking visage, Sarah Silverman once quipped, 'She is Jewish, right? If she isn't, someone should tell her face.'"

Writing earlier this year for the online magazine Tablet, Dvorah Meyers asserted that the singer's "unrepentant behaviour... signals Winehouse's place in a very different line of Jewish women – not the

Amy Winehouse

'nice' ones who make you chicken soup when you're sick or assure their sons that they're the smartest boys in the world and any woman would be lucky to marry them."

Instead, Meyers wrote, "Winehouse's ancestors are the biblical vixens: Dina, who slept with Shechem; Deborah, the biblical heroine; or, more recently, Monica Lewinsky, the 'portly pepperpot' (as the New York Post dubbed her) who nearly ended Bill Clinton's presidency."

In January 2009, with hostilities raging between Israeli and Hamas forces, Winehouse was one of several prominent Jewish figures identified by an Islamic extremist website as potential targets for "reprisal" attacks.

Winehouse was booed off the stage during a comeback performance in Serbia last month after staggering around.

Israel considering five-day workweek

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Could Israelis be heading for a Saturday-Sunday weekend? Not if the Finance Ministry has its way, though Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu promised to consider the proposal.

Among the public, the proposal has garnered mixed reviews. Haredim and teachers are appalled, tourism managers are rubbing their hands in glee, and the Histadrut Labor Federation is treading on eggshells.

The Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce showed unfettered enthusiasm: "Sunday off will boost the private sector," it stated.

Industrialists were muted: "The move's success depends on the government's ability to enforce a full working day on Friday."

The Finance Ministry refused to comment on the establishment of a committee headed by prime ministerial economics adviser, Eugene Kandel, to study the proposal, but recent comments demonstrate firm opposition, on the grounds that it would stunt economic growth.

Opponents argue that people would have to work longer hours on other days, which would impair productivity and widen social gaps.

Kandel's committee will have representatives from the relevant ministries and the Bank of Israel. It will study the implications of the proposal, tabled by Deputy Prime Minister Silvan Shalom, which extends the Friday workday to 2 p.m. and tacks extra hours onto workdays from Monday to Thursday.

"I'm in shock from the proposal to force people to work Friday and take Sunday off," said Mali Green, a reporter, author and haredi mother of 11. "It won't pass the reality test. Friday is the day we prepare for Shabbat. How can we work until 2?"

She represents the opposition to the proposal in haredi circles, and doesn't appreciate suggestions that people could use their Sundays to "travel and shop." "Who has the money for that?" Green says, adding that mothers with just three children say the same thing.

The haredi members of the coalition have not stated a position yet. Interior Minister Eli Yishai told the haredi radio station Kol Hai that Rabbi Ovadia Yosef opposes the concept, but called to wait until the committee has delivered its conclusions.

At the other end of the rainbow, Ami Federman, chair of the Hotels Association, thinks the two-day weekend would benefit the economy, not to mention encourage Israelis to spend more time at hotels. He is concerned, though, that hotel workers will demand Shabbat rates for working Sundays. Half the respondents to a survey conducted in 2010 for the Tourism Ministry said that if given longer weekends they would travel more; 40 per cent said they wouldn't.

Teachers are also among the opponents, largely because they can choose one day off each week. Often that day serves for further study to advance their careers. Now teachers fear they'll lose their day off if not taken on Sunday. The proposal isn't good for children, either, especially ones in poor neighbourhoods, argues Teachers Union chair Yossi Wasserman: They'll just roam the malls and get into trouble, he said.

The Bank of Israel refused to comment on the establishment of the committee headed by Kandel, saying only that it is studying the issue.

"The idea is lunacy," said Prof. Omer Moav, formerly an adviser to Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz. "Friday is an inefficient working day because it's only four to five hours, and it takes time to get to work. It simply won't pay for some employers."

In 2009, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics, the average working week was 39 hours, Moav said. The proposal's authors say that won't decline, but Moav argues it will: People will work fewer hours less efficiently.

Uriel Lynn, president of the Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce, begs to differ. "It will stimulate the private sector, mainly services and businesses," he said. Sunday will come to be characterized by shopping, culture, entertainment and sports, which will all be operating flat-out. But making sure that work continues until 2 p.m. on Friday is crucial, Lynn said: "That has to be solid. Workers can't start leaving at 12:30 p.m."

Short stories provide glimpses of postwar Europe

Mavis Gallant, now almost 90 years old, is arguably the best short story writer this country has produced. She is a child of a prewar Montreal divided along language and religious lines, and has lived in Paris since 1950, when she abandoned a career as a journalist with the Montreal Standard in favour of the challenge of writing fiction for a living.

Though she published two novels early on, the bulk of her output is made up of stories, the earliest of which appeared in The New Yorker. This placed her at the forefront of the then lucrative and influential short story market, where she would remain, even as magazine stories became an increasingly rare sighting.

Gallant's most recent Canadian collection, Going Ashore (McClelland & Stewart), appeared to too little fanfare, possibly because of the attentive reception given her much larger 1996 collection, The Selected Stories of Mavis Gallant. But Going Ashore reveals aspects of Gallant's career not on view in previous volumes, and provides wonderfully evocative glimpses of postwar Europe unavailable in the work of other Canadian writers.

Reviewed by Norman Ravvin

The editor of Going Ashore has shuffled the stories, so Gallant's earliest output appears alongside work from the 1980s. But it is the early pieces that make Going Ashore a great literary and historical offering. Stories from the 1950s reflect Gallant's broad interest in Europe at the time. A Day Like Any Other (1953) begins with two children looking from their hotel dining room at the Rhine, a winding "line, as thin as a hair" sunk in a mountainous valley, which one of the children promptly calls "Hitler's mountains."

Gallant has a fine eye for the ironies of the ongoing American occupation of Germany and elsewhere, and she addresses themes related to the aftermath of the war that drew silence from major writers of that period. She approaches the postwar moment in a darkly sardonic vein. American army officers are out of their depth in their effort to forge links with, even to speak the language of, the people they occupy. Army wives face aimless days, which Gallant may have viewed through the prism of her own youthful independence.

In Autumn Day, one of the magnificent, novelistic stories in Going Ashore, a young wife takes self-conscious account of her marriage as she rejoins her husband, who has been posted with the Army of Occupation in Salzburg. Once she "got down from the train at Salzburg Station" she "waved at Walt, smiling, the way girls do in illustrations. I could almost see myself, fresh and pretty, waving to someone in uniform. . . . When Walt took me in his arms, right in front of everyone, I was so engulfed by the idea of the picture it made that I thought I would cry. But then I remembered my luggage and turned away so that I could keep an eye on it. I had matching blue plaid suitcases, given me by my married sister as a going-away present, and I didn't want to lose them right at the start of my married life."

Autumn Day makes use of one of Gallant's trademark narrative strategies: a wise but still young narrator takes the measure of a host of idiosyncratic characters, all of whom pass through her otherwise mundane life like players in a dark comedy.

Billeted at the same farmhouse as Walt and his newly arrived wife is a group of postwar strays, each one emblematic of some strange and undisclosed aspect of the European collapse. "I didn't mix with the people on the farm," the narrator tells us. "They didn't want to mix with me. There were six boarders besides us: a Hungarian couple named de Kende – dark and fat with gold teeth; and a family from Vienna with two children... Sometimes I smiled at the two children, but they never smiled back. I wondered if they had been told not to."

The attentive reader may guess at some of these people's secrets, though it's impossible for us to know whether the average suburban New Yorker subscriber, in 1950s Scarsdale or Oakville, could do the same. Gallant develops her theme with a hint of Chekhov and a touch of off-kilter comedy, when the young army wife finds herself drinking tasteless coffee in the disordered rooms belonging to the "Hungarian couple named de Kende." There, Mrs. de Kende, suddenly and as if by strange compulsion, reveals: "My husband is a Jew. . .. Do you realize what would happen if it were known? We wouldn't be welcome in this house ... My husband would lose his clients... Look at my life, at the way I am forced to live. I am the daughter of an Army officer. God is punishing me for having married a Jew."

The moment and place – the European countryside a few years after the Holocaust – flares into view, just as Gallant's narrator realizes how little interest there is among her compatriots in talking openly about such things. Autumn Day shifts, at its close, back to domestic miseries, but Gallant's narrator tells us what such encounters felt like. "I felt an almost unbearable nostalgia," she tells us, "for the figure I was leaving behind, the shell of the girl who had got down from the train in September, the pretty girl with all the blue plaid luggage. I could never be that girl again, not entirely. Too much had happened in between."

These short passages convey the remarkable mastery of tone, subtle irony and characterization in Gallant's earliest published work. This is in contrast with the early work of Mordecai Richler or Hugh Garner, where energetic, often funny prose might, at times, have profited from a sharper editorial knife. Gallant teaches us how to write well, just as her early work broadens our sense of how one lived through the challenges of postwar recovery.

Norman Ravvin's recent publications include a novel, The Joyful Child (Gaspereau Press) and Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein (McGill-Queen's), which he co-edited with Sherry Simon.

Debut CD has roots in Hebrew school

Laura Fixman
Intern

Jordan Fine, a.k.a. Fine Canadian Forces, said the title of his first full-length album, Hebrew Lessons, is connected to the time he spent studying at Beth Tzedec Congregation's Hebrew school.

"A lot of people find music to be a religious experience, and that's where the title came from," he said.

Fine, a 29-year-old Toronto native, specializes in loop-pedal music (repetitive, rhythmic musical patterns or dense layers of sound) and covers a variety of songs by artists such as Steve Winwood, Rick Springfield, the Beatles and the McGarrigle sisters in Hebrew Lessons. He spent three years on a cruise ship as a guitarist, and when he came back home to Toronto, he wanted to work on his own album.

Fine began recording Hebrew Lessons in late 2009 and finished it in May 2010.

"It took a lot longer than I expected, and it was more work than I thought it would be," Fine said.

He added that as he isn't represented by a music label, he had more to do than record, including co-ordinating the cover art with the CD manufacturer and arranging recording time in the studio.

"My favourite part was having a CD in my hand, but spending time in the studio is always fun, too," he said. "I love just playing music."

He said that the CD didn't turn out exactly as he had envisioned it. The songs have remained basically the same, he said but the sound changed a little.

"One of the things I try to do is I write music that I like to listen to," he said. "I write something that I like, and I hope other people will like it, too."

Fine said that he's considered himself a musician since his parents enrolled him in piano lessons when he was six or seven years old. He also plays trombone, and was involved in music throughout high school and university.

He said that his goal with his music has always remained the same. "There's always been a sort of a steady goal to keep evolving as a musician and to have people listening to the art I make."

Now that he's finished the album, Fine is rehearsing and promoting his CD. He also has a day job and plays trombone for the rock band Five Star Trailer Park and lead guitar for the band Lake Country VHS.

Fine said his influences include yacht rock, progressive rock, glam metal and grunge.

"I'm very inspired by other music," Fine said. "I'm a very enthusiastic musician, and I want to get that across to others."

Hebrew Lessons features electric guitars and effects and a Korg synthesizer, and organic music, including vocal beat-box percussion, brass and vocals.

Personal stories from across Canada

Laura Fixman

When Irene Davis proposed the idea of publishing an anthology to a group of writers she kept in contact with by e-mail, and was volunteered to be the book's editor, she didn't anticipate the four months of intense work that lay ahead.

The anthology, called Prose to Go: Tales from a Private List, is a collection of 34 personal stories from 18 contributors from across Canada. The contributors are members of a private e-mail list who share their writing. Davis said getting to know the contributors, many of whom she had never met in person, was one of the things that made her hard work worth it.

"The stories themselves are actual glimpses of people," she said. "You actually get to know these people."

Davis contributed three stories to the anthology. One of her stories, Places of the Heart, recounts her childhood memory of Kensington Market, from about 1940. She writes about her grandmother choosing the chicken they would eventually have for Shabbat dinner and how her grandfather would come home from synagogue with a kiss for her grandmother. Davis, who's still a Toronto resident, said that she often writes about her childhood.

"Sometimes I need to write because it's a way to get down my feelings and memories," she said. "I often write just for myself, and it ends up getting published."

Irene Davis

She said the anthology's writers were easy to work with, and she had to make very few changes to their work. The anthology is separated into categories, including "misadventures," "what in the world" and "exit laughing." Davis said these categories arose naturally from the stories that were submitted and that she found it easy to switch from the role of a writer to an editor.

"I was always looking at it with an editor's eye, but I was also enjoying it," she said. "Without an editor, you get to close to your work and you don't see it in the same way."

Davis was the primary editor of the anthology, Barbara Florio-Graham was the managing editor and Fred Desjardins was the acquisitions editor. The three editors live in different provinces and communicated mostly by e-mail. Although they rarely met, Davis said that they got very close.

"It was this technology that allowed us to do this," she said. "It's a real relationship and we become quite close."

Davis said that as they had no budget and they were volunteering their time, they had to work around their other commitments. She said putting the book together was the most challenging thing she had ever done.

"I had no idea what it was going to be like," Davis said. "We kind of just went at it."

Davis said she would love to work on a second anthology someday, but for now is teaching a grammar course online.

She said that her love of writing may have started when her father taught her to read when she was three years old. She added that she started writing professionally later in life, after raising three children. She also took a creative writing course at Seneca College, which she said taught her a lot about the craft.

As a writer, she enjoys the challenge of starting out with facts and turning them into something people would be interested in reading.

"I like doing interviews and putting it all together," she said. "I like making a real story out of it."

Davis has some advice for people interested in becoming professional writers.

"Read a lot, read the magazines and publications you want to publish to and get to know the audience," she said. "Send queries, and you want to show them you can write. Be prepared for rejection, and when your story does finally make it, learn from it."

The stories in Prose to Go were originally published in The Jewish Magazine, the Globe and Mail, the Ottawa Citizen and others.

EYE ON ARTS

By BILL GLADSTONE

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART II: MOACYR SCLIAR, MAGIC REALISM & MAX AND THE CATS

Brazilian writer Moacyr Scliar, who died earlier this year at 73, was a proponent of "magic realism," a category of fiction prevalent among South American writers and especially evident in two of Scliar's best-known novels, Max And The Cats (1981) and The Centaur In The Garden (1984).

As it happens, the phrase "magic realism" aptly describes something that happened to me recently. Walking home from synagogue, I got into a conversation with a friend about Max and the Cats. When I admitted I had never read the copy on my bookshelf, my friend urged me to read it that very day, saying it would require only a couple of hours.

At home, as I opened the book for a cozy read, something fell out of it: five pages of my handwritten notes from an interview I had evidently conducted with Scliar in 2003 during the International Authors Festival in Toronto. I was astonished: Had I really spoken with Scliar? How could I have forgotten? (Eventually I realized that we had never met, only spoken by telephone.)

Reading the interview felt strangely like getting a personalized preface to a book from a writer situated beyond the grave. Even so, Scliar was articulate, lively and thoughtful. When I got to reading Max and the Cats, it seemed similarly robust with Jewish concerns and pulsating with vibrant, albeit nervous, life.

Max, the novel's central character, is forced to escape Berlin in the late 1930s after his affair with a married woman is discovered. His steamship sinks in mid-ocean, however, and he shares a lifeboat with a jaguar, who stares menacingly at him but mysteriously forbears from eating him. Paralyzed with fear, Max catches fish to keep both himself and the jaguar alive.

Eventually the lifeboat reaches the shores of Brazil, the jaguar bounds into the forest, and Max is rescued, ultimately supposing the cat may have been a hallucination. But the various Nazis that turn up in postwar Brazil are no hallucination and no less threatening than the jaguar: they haunt his life and destroy his peace.

Scliar, a medical doctor who devoted all of his spare time to writing, was the son of immigrants from the Russian province of Bessarabia who came to South America during the period of Jewish mass migration a century ago. Unlike many writers within the tradition of magic realism, his use of its conventions was not meant as a political metaphor for snarling national dictators with sharp claws, but rather as a means to reflect upon the fearful and often paranoiac modern Jewish sensibility.

The Centaur in the Garden focused on a man who has a double identity as a centaur, very much like the Jew in Brazilian society, Scliar told me. "In your home, with your Jewish meals, you follow your tradition, you keep Shabbat, and you speak Yiddish. When you go on the street, the language is different and the customs are different, and you feel divided. And this is not bad for writers. In my case it was a source of inspiration."

Scliar and his wife and son lived in Porte Alegre, a city roughly the size of Toronto, where he said he felt comfortable living as a Jew within a tolerant society. "I am very proud to be Jewish," he said, noting that only the week before he had been admitted into the Brazilian Academy of Letters, a prestigious cultural institution. "I said on that occasion that for me it was a great honour because I was there as a member of the Jewish community, as a writer of Jewish influence."

His own literary influences included Sholem Aleichem, Y. L. Peretz and, as astute readers will quickly deduce, Franz Kafka. "Isaac Babel, the Russian novelist and short-story teller, is one of my favourites," he said. "There are some stories of his that I've read at least 20 times."

The main question I had for Scliar, and perhaps the very question that had brought him to Toronto, had to do with the similarity of the 2002 book Life of Pi to Max and the Cats, a situation that had generated a literary controversy. The commercially successful novel by Canadian writer Yann Martel had seemingly borrowed from Max and the Cats the central situation of a man and a great cat on a lifeboat.

Although Martel has always denied reading that novel before writing his own, Scliar said the duplication had troubled him. "I would prefer that the publicity came out of the novel itself. I'm a little bit sad because the publicity came from the scandal, which is the case with many Latin American authors. That is, you are noticed when there is something with a book, not the book itself — a political situation, or the writer is under arrest. I would prefer that the novel would be noticed because of the novel itself."

Martel, who won the Man Booker Prize worth $75,000 for Life of Pi, has always claimed that he purposely avoided reading Max and the Cats because he wanted to lessen its influence on him; however, he admitted that he was "indebted to Mr. Moacyr Scliar for the spark of life" he had given Life of Pi.

Perhaps it's a good thing that I put Max and the Cats aside in 2003, so that I could come back to it and read it now on its own terms, recognizing it as the fine and memorable short novel that it is. Let's hope Scliar isn't entirely overlooked next year when director Ang Lee's planned film treatment of Life of Pi is due in theatres.

Joe Montana delivers pep talk at Y dinner

Harvey Rosen
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — NFL Hall of Famer Joe Montana wowed the crowd of 1,300 worshippers recently at the 39th "Y" Sports Dinner at the Winnipeg Convention Centre.

His inspirational talk dealt primarily with how he managed against all odds to reach the pinnacle of his career. "Preparation, work ethic, and trust" were key themes of his presentation.

Montana said that it's the little things that count in life. There are small things we learn along the way that appear to be trivial and of little significance but later on prove to be unpredictably beneficial.

The assembled throng clearly idolized the gifted athlete who is probably among the top three signal callers of all time. (Discuss among yourselves.)

In his 16-year-career (two of which he played with Kansas City Chiefs), "Joe Cool" led the San Francisco 49ers to four Super Bowl victories and won 70 per cent of all the games he started. Not to mention that he is the all-time NFL leader in quarterback ratings at 93.4 per cent.

Oh, he also brought excitement to the gridiron! The man who has endured countless injuries (torn elbow tendon, broken fingers, cracked ribs, a separated shoulder, and a ruptured disc) while on his merry way to being honoured in the hallowed halls of Canton, Ohio was famously the author of the late-game comeback.

Montana, who retired from pro football in 1995, had barely begun to speak when he was welcomed with applause by his rising devotees. Montana strolled, or was it paced nervously back and forth with microphone in hand, upon a raised platform and delivered, essentially, what resembled a motivational speech at a conference of jaded teachers, surgeons, or lawyers.

Montana explained that no matter where you work, it is important to treat the people next to you with respect and to show loyalty whether you like them or not.

Team play wins football games. "Head coach Bill Walsh taught us that this is what the game is all about. He brought on all people who thought alike. We didn't have a lot of 'me' people. You all had to believe in the same thing; 80 per cent is mental preparation and the remainder is athleticism," he explained.

Montana also said that Walsh, who called most of their plays, changed his whole thought process during a game. "I tried to run the plays, about 150 kinds, through my mind and we used only about 35 of them in a game."

Montana never failed to appreciate where he had come from and where it got him.

"Sunday afternoon in the fall is one of the most exciting days of your life. Why do you think (20-year-veteran quarterback) Brett Favre wanted to play so long?"

According to Montana perhaps the best QB he has seen play in his time was Dan Marino who could make all kinds of plays, but he didn't really like to compare the signal callers "because they're all different."

Both of Montana's sons are quarterbacks, but he had to hire a coach "cause they didn't want to listen to me," he laughed.

In a surprise revelation, Montana shared that in his first year at Notre Dame, he was only the seventh stringer. "You get a little bit disheartened," he said. "It takes (however) just one play (to get you noticed) and you have to prepare yourself all the time (to be ready) when it happens because you just don't know when it'll come again."

Montana was preceded on stage by American comedian Alonzo Bodden, who challenged the legendary QB for top banana status with his wit and delivery.

He described his own material as "cynically good-natured, in an angry black suburban kind of way." He also tells us in his bio: "What can I say, the stupid out there is wearing me down." The former teacher of airplane mechanics was once laid off, attended comedy class in the interim and went on to make a stage name for himself.

A former winner of NBC's Last Comic Standing, who also had roles in several movies, Bodden soon had the audience in the palm of his hand. His jokes showed that he was familiar with the province's goings-on plus other current events of the day.

Joe Montana

"The Vancouver [hockey] riot? I watched it on TV. I thought it was cute; I'm from Los Angeles."

Standing with his back to the seated Montana, he noted: "First time a black man is standing in front of Joe Montana and not protecting him!"

Then there was the barb about Jewish Congressman Anthony Weiner from Brooklyn, the latest politician who had to resign due to a sex scandal after exchanging nude photos of himself with women.

"What was Weiner thinking? QB Brent Favre was an NFL quarterback and it didn't work for him.

"What's the big deal," continued Bodden, "If I had turned on my computer and saw that a woman sent me a nude photo of herself, "I'd have shouted, 'There is a God after all!'"

And so it went for at least a half-hour, ending in a standing ovation.

From an entertainment standpoint, call it a draw between Bodden and Montana. The former made them laugh and the latter has people pondering life's lessons. My informal straw vote following the proceedings gave the funny man a split-decision. Go figure.

Post Patter: The 2011 Jewish Athlete of the Year award went to wrestler Caleb Rutner, 16, who prevailed over three other gems: Mitch Billinkoff (table tennis) a former winner, golfer Mindy Lichtman, and marathon runner deluxe Reesa Simmonds.

Canadian actor converts to Judaism

Laura Fixman
Intern

The star of the Canadian supernatural series Lost Girl, Anna Silk, said that converting to Judaism brought her closer to her husband, actor Seth Cooperman.

When she started dating Cooperman, who's originally from New York, Silk would frequently ask him questions about his religion. They celebrated Jewish holidays together, and when she made the decision to convert, they decided to take the classes together.

"It was a really nice experience growing and learning together," Silk said. "It was a very fun and emotional process for us."

She added that the conversion was easy for her because she wasn't raised with any organized religion. Instead of converting from another religion, she said it was more like simply becoming Jewish.

"It all felt very natural to me, and it's an important part of his life."

Silk said that she enjoyed the classes she had to take before converting because they were not only about learning facts. Questioning what she learned was encouraged, and that was something she didn't expect.

"I really liked how things could be questioned, and I was surprised to be able to do that," Silk said.

Silk converted to Judaism in February of this year, and she said her husband was very happy about it and her family was very supportive. Since then, she has celebrated Passover with friends in Toronto, and she has several favourite Jewish holidays, which she likes for different reasons.

She said that she likes Chanukah because it has a very celebratory mood. She likes Passover because even though it's always the same story, she feels like she learns something new every year. She said that Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur may be more intense than the other holidays, but they're the most important.

"I feel like they act as a very good reminder to reflect," Silk said.

In addition to bringing her closer to her husband, the conversion class allowed her to meet other couples with one non-Jewish partner, who made up most of the class. Her husband would help her with the homework she'd get, and she said that he often joked that he didn't want her to know more than him. She added that it was very important that they experienced the conversion together as much as possible.

Anna Silk

"I had already made the decision to convert before, but these classes were to make myself more informed," she said.

Silk now wears a gold necklace with a Star of David on it, and she said that where she got it is significant for her. It had belonged to her grandmother, who wasn't Jewish but had gotten it from a friend. Her grandmother died more than 10 years ago, but Silk feels as if she ended up with the necklace because somehow her grandmother knew what was going to happen.

"I like that it came from part of my family," Silk said. "Even though they're not Jewish, it's like they were a part of it."

She added that she's very happy to have converted to Judaism, and it was an easier decision and process than she had expected.

"It was just amazing," she said. "It was just the most obvious and natural thing in the world for me."

Silk is from Fredericton, N.B., and moved to Toronto in 1999 to pursue acting after graduating from St. Thomas University with a degree in psychology. Her mother is a theatre actor in Fredericton, so she has been involved in acting for her whole life.

Silk was nominated for a Gemini award for her appearances on the show Being Erica. She returned to Toronto for filming Lost Girl. In Lost Girl, she plays Bo, a type of "fae," or supernatural creature, called a succubus, who feeds on sexual energy. Although she plays a supernatural character, Silk said she related to Bo in many ways.

"I relate to her in that she grew up not realizing she was part of this world, and now she understands where she belongs," Silk said.

She enjoys playing Bo for many reasons, including the fact that she's a supernatural creature and she slowly discovers her part in a hidden supernatural world.

"I love it. It's such a fun world to play in," she said.

Silk added that she feels that she's learned and grown at the same pace as Bo. She said that in the second season, which she's currently filming, Bo has grown significantly.

"At first she was very scared and vulnerable," she said. "She's always been a very tough character, but she's not tough just for the sake of being tough."

Silk has also appeared in the shows Ghost Whisperer and Billable Hours. She gained some recognition playing a stressed-out flight attendant trying to quit smoking in a NicoDerm commercial.

Lost Girl returns to the Showcase network for a second season with 22 episodes on Sept. 4.

Kids' feelings come first

Dear Ella,

My little girl, Emma, is off at overnight camp for the first time. It's going to be a long summer without her, but she wanted to go so badly I didn't have the heart to say no. She is only eight, and I thought she should wait at least another year before she attempted sleepover camp.

Visitors' day is very important to me. The problem is, her dad and I are divorced and we don't get along. Most of our communication about our daughter is through e-mail or lawyers. We do everything possible to avoid speaking to or seeing each other. He is going to want to see Emma too, and the thought of sharing her with him and his new girlfriend at camp is not something I fancy.

Ask Ella

Ella Burakowski

Emma is used to our doing things separately. We celebrate birthdays, holidays and any other special occasion separately, and she has accepted this as normal.

He let me take her to the bus when she left, because he had to work anyway, but we have not even discussed visitors' day. I'm sure he could care less if I'm there and he will just go, with no regard to my feelings or my daughter's. This should be a fun time for her, and I don't want anything to spoil her memory of her first year at overnight camp. Should I take the high road and just let him go?

Lonely Mom

Dear Lonely Mom,

Overnight camp is a milestone in your daughter's life. It's a bittersweet time for you, but you put your feelings aside knowing Emma is going to have a wonderful time. At overnight camp she will build independence and social skills, and make new, lifelong friends. It's a new experience for her, too, so it's extremely important that her first experience without her parents is a positive one.

If there is the slightest chance that you and your ex will argue, or even give off negative energy, around Emma, then you can't go to visitors' day together. Kids pick up on fake smiles and tension in the air. This is her time and you must both put your needs aside.

Staying away on visitors' day is not the answer. Emma will miss you and want to see her mom as much as her dad. I agree that visiting together may be uncomfortable for all. You are not the only divorced family at camp, and many camps have adjusted and added a second day. If Emma's camp is not one of those, then speak to the camp director, and he/she will accommodate your situation.

The next hurdle is who gets the "real" visitors' day and who gets the extra day that has been allocated for Emma. Visitors' day is not always easy on kids, and some camps with a shorter duration have eliminated this tradition. Two days could cause emotional feelings twice. You might consider splitting up the day so that one of you is with her in the morning and the other in the afternoon.

You and your ex have some choices to make. Whatever you decide, remember you must do what's best for Emma. Your priority must be to make sure your daughter is happy in this new life experience.

A place for yogurt in your life?

There has been enormous media coverage lately about "superbugs," and a number of hospital deaths have been reported, many of which have occurred in older patients.

One of the culprits is a micro-organism (bacteria/germ) called C. Difficile, and although quite ubiquitous in nature, it can develop into a more virulent strain that can cause life-threatening illnesses often associated with severe diarrhea.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

There are powerful antibiotics that are potentially useful in treating C. Difficile. It would be preferable, however, to prevent the infections from occurring, especially in those who have received antibiotic therapy for any infection, trivial or serious. In addition to preventative hygienic approaches such as scrupulous, careful and frequent hand-washing by all members of the health-care team to avoid transmission of the infectious bacteria, there has been a recent resurgence in exploring the beneficial effects of the consumption of "probiotics," bacteria that are harmless to humans but can prevent the C.Difficile from colonizing an individual and causing a serious infection.

As a young medical resident in Jerusalem in the 1970s, I recall the older east European physicians routinely giving their patients on broad-spectrum antibiotics yogurt, as a means to combat the often observed diarrhea that accompanied the antibiotic therapy. At the time, there was no scientific evidence supporting this, but anecdotally that was their belief, and it made it into my own practice, informally, since those years.

As the prevalence of antibiotic-associated diarrheal illness has become better recognized and the role of C. Difficile better understood, there are many medical specialists who are researching the issue and already recommend probiotics to patients who are receiving antibiotics. Probiotics can be given as tablets or by eating yogurt, a rich source of these bacteria. I recommended this for my late father during the times he received antibiotics. Whether because of or despite the yogurt, he never suffered from a diarrheal illness or C.Difficile infection despite many courses of antibiotics at home and when he was hospitalized.

A recent Toronto Star headline read, "Hospitals should use probiotics to fight superbug, scientist says." They quote Dr. Karen Madsen a University of Alberta professor of medicine, who does research on probiotics. She said, "It's such a cheap thing to do and there is increasing evidence that it is very effective. Any elderly patient going into the hospital on antibiotics, I think they should be getting this stuff." She cited a recent study published in the American Journal of Gastroenterology that showed a 95 per cent drop in the number of patients who contracted C. Difficile after being given two doses of the probiotic Lactobacillus acidophilus, which is found in most yogurts.

The history of yogurt goes back centuries and was touted for all kinds of health benefits, some of which may be spurious. But as an inexpensive and potentially beneficial way of decreasing the risk of antibiotic-related diarrhea, including the potentially serious C. Difficile, this seems to make good sense.

If, for some reason, the question of a need for an antibiotic comes up, you should first ascertain how important the use of the drug is. If your physician feels you should take the medication, have a cup or two of yogurt (many kinds are available that have substantial amounts of probiotic) each day for the days of treatment and a few days afterward. With a bit of luck this might help you avoid antibiotic-related diarrhea and perhaps the more dreaded C. Difficile infection – and when combined with fruit, yogurt is a very tasty and nutritious dish.

Toronto's favourite festival offers fun for the whole family

Toronto's favourite street festival has a whole new way to celebrate the fun and flavours of Greece and summer in the city. Every year in August, the city of Toronto flocks to GreekTown on the Danforth. Now celebrating its 18th year, the

Canada's largest street festival is favourite event of GTA residents

Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth is Canada's largest street festival, welcoming approximately 1.3 million visitors. A Decima Research poll reported that 90% of respondents identified "The Taste" as their favourite GTA festival event — beating out such iconic events as the Toronto International Film Festival, Caribana and Pride Week.

The GTA has more than 200,000 residents of Greek ancestry, the third largest Hellenic community outside of Greece, and between August 5th and August 7th, 2011, everyone who comes to the Danforth gets to be Greek for the day.

This year, as in 2009 and 2010, Pilaros International Trading Inc. is proud to be the Title Sponsor of the Taste of the Danforth. Pilaros is a leading importer of Mediterranean food products, primarily olives and olive oil — what the ancient Greeks referred to as "The Essence of Life".

As always, this year's Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth has loads of free fun, family-friendly activities for your entertainment and enjoyment. For highlights refer to page 9; for a complete list of events, performers and showtimes, visit www.tasteofthedanforth.com.

But when you visit the Taste, you're not just having fun; you're also helping to save lives. To date this event has raised well over $1 million in support of Toronto East General Hospital Foundation. How's that for a win-win?

With singing, dancing and entertainment galore, the Taste has always had theatrical flair. This year, Alliance Films helps take it to a whole new level with their sponsorship of many themed events geared towards their upcoming releases The Immortals, One Day, Spy Kids 4, and Don't Be Afraid of The Dark.

The Immortals, to be released 11•11•11, is an epic 3-D battle film loosely based on Greek mythology. For more details see page 9.

Over $1,000,000 raised in support of Toronto East General Hospital

The Alliance themed events — "Powered By The Immortals" — include the Spy Kids 4 Zone, the Don't Be Afraid Of The Dark Haunted House, and the One Day Photo Souvenir Zone.

When you're at the Taste, make sure to pick up a festival brochure at one of the many onsite TORONTO.COM booths. On the back of that brochure is a Secret Code that will give you a chance to win a Trip For Two To Glorious Greece, courtesy of Transat Holidays.

And of course there will be free music and entertainment galore, including the most incredible Greek music this side of Greece, rap, blues, dance routines, a Kids' Fun Zone, and much more. On the Celebrity Stage, enjoy performances by Second City, the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, and Tributes To Elvis and Elton John that must be seen and heard to be believed.

With great food, great entertainment and great family fun, a splendid time is guaranteed for all.

We look forward to seeing you at the Taste. Opa!

This year, Montreal-based Pilaros International Trading is once again gratified to sponsor the 18th Annual Taste of The Danforth. To President Miltiadis ("Milton") Antypas, the Taste is much more than a branding opportunity.

"When we were approached two years ago about sponsoring the Taste, we were aware of its history, and excited at the chance to be involved. We knew it was a wonderful cause. Now that we've come aboard, we are even more impressed at the community's participation and the passion they bring to the event, at all levels.

We share that passion. Our entire team is focused on ensuring that this year's Taste is the best ever.

We are proud to associate our name with such a prestigious event. But it's much more than a marketing opportunity. It's a chance to help save lives. We'd like to thank everyone involved — the Toronto East General Hospital, the merchants, and especially, you the public — for helping to make this a reality. Opa!"

Christina's Greek cuisine rivalled only by...its brunch

The sea is prevalent in Greek photoscapes for a reason. It isn't just a geographical detail, it's integral to the Greek state of mind.

"Fresh catch of the day" is therefore more than just a menu item in most Greek restaurants; it represents a way of life. Nowhere is this more evident than at Christina's, where market-fresh fish is brought in daily, prepared and served as it typically is in a Greek fishing village.

Stuffed lamb is another yardstick by which Greek restaurants are measured. The preparation is meticulous, and Christina's version — with Spinach, Sautéed Onion, Pepper And Fresh Herbs — shows the attention to detail that a discerning clientele demands. The grill and seafood platters are other examples of Christina's ability to deliver a level of refinement and subtlety of flavour that few restaurants can.

But Greek cuisine is only part of the Christina's story. If you haven't enjoyed their weekend brunch, you're missing a whole other side to the grand old girl.

The brunch now rivals the lunch and dinner menu in positive customer feedback. An irresistible combination of traditional breakfast fare with Mediterranean-influenced items has placed Christina's in the same conversation as a select few restaurants reputed for their brunch. Christina's introduced theirs in response to the Danforth's increasingly cosmopolitan appeal, with a menu featuring an eclectic mix of traditional continental favorites like French Toast and English muffins along with nine 3-egg omelette choices, both western and Greek-inspired, all served with rosemary home fries and seasonal fruit or toast.

The best part? This elegant fare, enjoyed in Christina's relaxing ambience, is priced comparably to a standard eat-and-run breakfast special.

Regardless of the mealtime or the occasion, the consistency on which Christina's reputation was built has never wavered. Every item on the menu is treated with consummate respect.

Complimenting the dining experience is a selection of wines (Greek in particular) that would rival some private collections. Wine connoisseurs gravitate here, and all guests can count on their server to recommend the appropriate vintage.

Live Greek music and belly dancing on Friday and Saturday evenings is still a mainstay, and GreekTown's only year-round heated patio ensures your comfort when Mother Nature doesn't.

Christina's management seems to have thought of everything, but like the perennial honours student, they never stop striving for excellence.

Pantheon: at last, a true fish story

The term "fish story" probably traces its origins to an early fisherman's wild exaggeration of the size of his catch.

Unlike the foregoing, Pantheon has a true fish story — not about size but about freshness. If you've heard that it has the absolute freshest fish you've ever tasted, then your source is reliable. In 13 years since dropping anchor on the Danforth, Pantheon has "netted" a reputation that extends far beyond the bounds of GreekTown.

Freshness is only Chapter One of the Pantheon story, however. Chapter Two unfolds with chef Nick Parousis exhibiting the perfect timing required to maximize the inherent flavour and freshness of each variety of fish.

Chapter Three: Decisions, Decisions. For many Pantheon-goers, the question is not Should we have fish, but rather Which fish? Red snapper, Atlantic salmon and sea bass are here in abundance, but so are many other exotic selections you're unlikely to find elsewhere. Pantheon eliminates the need to call around to see who has what; if it resides in the ocean depths, it's here. Baby sea smelts and fresh anchovies are imported directly from Greece. Striped bass, orange roughy, black porgy, red mullet, sea smelts, and many others, impeccably prepared and seasoned, gratify the most discriminating fish and seafood lovers. At Pantheon, you could dine on a different fresh fish every day for a fortnight.

But don't assume that fish and seafood are Pantheon's only strengths. The overall excellence

"As golden and desirable as an Olympic medal"

across the entire menu and the gracious hospitality that allow a newly-minted restaurant to double in size after only six years in business are also in evidence. Parousis' partner John Troupis and his son Bobby Troupis understand that food is not merely sustenance, but art and soul. In that spirit, they do their utmost to ensure that each customer's visit is a sensory expenence.

Embodying that spirit are two bright, spacious dining rooms. Semi-private dining with a comforting fireplace is available in the east room. Best to reserve to avoid wait times.

In a demanding business where turnover is the norm, Pantheon's continuity stands out. The same head chef and most of the same wait staff present when it opened are still in place. People enjoy working here, they like the clientele, and the clientele likes them. Continuity fosters loyalty, and vice versa.

Conclusion. No meal is complete without Pantheon's honey cake. Its flavour, texture, and moistness are to die for. Even that description falls short, however. Words don't do it justice. You simply must taste it to believe it.

The Olympic Pantheon was blessed with the opportunity to sample the Ambrosia and Nectar of the Gods. Unlike the Olympics which happens ever four years, here you can indulge in those same taste sensations whenever the mood strikes you.

And that's no fish story.

Astoria's second location more of a good thing, say customers

How do you duplicate a one-of-a-kind? You don't. You make a second one in the general image of the first, retaining its best characteristics and adding a few proprietary tweaks of its own — then invite the former's fan club to discover the latter.

To say that Astoria's Mississauga location was an overnight success would be misleading. True, it was instantly embraced by Greek food lovers. Many who live or work west of the 427 were gratified to trade in traffic jams on the 401 and the QEW for quicker access to their favourite restaurant. Some Astoria regulars east of the 427 have found it to their liking simply as a change of pace, or for the novelty of free parking. And, says Company Director Peter Kerasiotis, the expansion was carefully coordinated with major renovations to the GreekTown location to ensure a slow, smooth transition to a new, brighter and bolder Astoria.

"We measure our success by customer satisfaction"

"Any art critic knows a cheap reproduction from the original. It's the same with food. You don't take a brand with a 40-year history of success and give it a quick facelift, nor do you cookie-cutter it." Lifelong Astoria customers, he says, have developed such a proprietary relationship with Astoria that "they consider it theirs — and it is. Their loyalty and support over four decades gives them an ownership stake. It may not be on paper, but as a bond and a partnership it carries equal weight. Everything that's been done has been done with our customers in mind, and in response to their wishes." Responding to customer feedback is a constant, he says. "We're not expanding so much as growing the brand. In some people's minds, expansion implies dilution. That's not our m.o. We felt the way to achieve that and maintain quality control and consistency is by doing it slowly. We're not a fast food restaurant charting growth by how many franchises we can open in a year. We measure our success by customer satisfaction, one meal at a time."

The cornerstones of successful restauranteuring — freshness, quality, and friendly personal service — are unfailingly apparent at both locations. Astoria still imports staples such as feta cheese, olive oil and olives in small quantities directly from Greece. Their staggering portions still quell the most outrageous appetites.

While customer feedback is Astoria's #1 barometer, a little third-party corroboration never hurts. Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life and "Best of Toronto" by Now, Astoria is also a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant, and was rated "Best Greek International Restaurant" by Where.

New generations of Greek food lovers with increasingly sophisticated palates have prompted many restaurants to overhaul their menus. Astoria has resisted sweeping changes in favour of subtle tweaks, while retaining the favourite dishes beloved by young and old alike. If it ain't broke, don't fix it; Astoria's souvlaki, moussaka and grilled fresh fish taste as good today as they did four decades ago. It's hard to improve on perfection.

"Best of the City"
Toronto Life

Greek appetizers like grilled calamari and creamy homemade tzatziki are a welcome prelude to your feast, if you can keep your Astoria-induced souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

It's no accident that the first signs of an upcurve in the popularity of Greek cuisine coincided with Astoria's opening, nor is it coincidental that Greek food's continued growth in popularity parallels that of the Astoria we know today.

It's too early to tell if Astoria's Mississauga location is the start of a GreekTown West. Some old customers for whom the Danforth location will always be the Mother Ship wouldn't go elsewhere if you paid them. For others, the new location is like having a favourite relative in another city: something to look forward to when you travel. Either way, there's more of Astoria to love.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Taste buds dance with anticipation at Mezes

You can feel the positive energy as you approach the patio. You can hear the buzz as you enter. Your excitement builds as you're seated. Your taste buds dance with anticipation as you're handed a menu.

It's magic.

Most of the fine Greek restaurants on the Danforth will give you a pleasant dining experience. Mezes has far loftier goals. Here, even the most casual meal becomes a festive occasion. You'll experience such joie-de-vivre (the Greeks call it kharisma) that you'll find yourself wondering what special event you're celebrating.

Just another meal? At Mezes, there's no such thing. They never take food for granted.

Mezes makes every meal an event. If it's your first time here, you're inclined to inquire: Whose birthday is it? Is there a graduation party going on? Is someone celebrating their anniversary?

It could be any of those things. But more often than not, it's just families or friends enjoying a convivial meal, in the same lively and animated style as they would at home.

Kharisma.

Here, they treat food with consummate respect. The mere act of serving it is a sacred trust. And sharing isn't an option here, it's Plan A. The namesake, appetizer-sized mezes are meant to be ordered in multitudes and collectively enjoyed by the table. This communal style of dining — as authentically Greek as the gastronomy — isn't just sharing, it's a form of bonding.

"It makes for a convivial meal," says Mezes proprietor Sue Zindros. "It stimulates conversation, sharing good feelings as well as food, and it encourages people to try new things."

Be prepared to explore Greek cuisine as you never have before. Unlike most restaurants which offer a handful of appetizers, Mezes' list goes on...and on...and on, item after delicious item. It's like a book you can't put down — until your whetted appetite compels you to.

It's become commonplace for dining establishments to advertise their cuisine as "authentic" and "fresh from scratch", but Mezes has quietly been fulfilling both these mandates since Day 1. If anything, at Mezes these claims are understated.

Mezes pays top dollar for all their ingredients to ensure you enjoy the best of everything. But that added expense is not reflected in their prices.

"Our customers can taste the difference freshness and quality make. We believe in rewarding them for that, not penalizing them," says Sue.

The consistent excellence menu-wide makes it difficult to pick favourites here, so most customers start by ordering a large assortment of appetizers. They're all first-rate, but don't just fall back on old favourites like hummous and tzatziki; no visit to GreekTown is complete without sampling Mezes' Gigantes and Dolmades. When it comes time to order your entrée — if you can manage to get through the cornucopia of mezes — there's an equally compelling array of home-cooked meat, poultry, fish and vegetarian specialties to tempt your palate.

Mezes offers one of the most extensive Greek wine portfolios not just in Toronto, but nationwide, and can recommend the ideal accompaniment to your meal.

Since the Mezes first opened its doors, it has distinguished itself not only by an unwavering commitment to excellence, but also by recognizing that the simple pleasure of enjoying a meal with friends and family isn't just one of life's important things.

It's life itself.

Ouzeri: Danforth's most relaxed dining

A splash of vibrant colour, sweeping sky-blue awnings, and a festive patio beckon you inside. It's as if you stepped straight off the sidewalk onto the beach. Ouzeri has the unique ability to relax you in seconds — a valuable asset when you consider that the enjoyment of any meal hinges first and foremost on the absence of stress. This is the one GreekTown restaurant that feels like one giant patio. Even when you're seated inside, the open, airy ambience gives you a sense of freedom, of letting go.

500A Danforth Ave. 416.778.0500

Like their pride and joy, brothers Chris and Alex Trahiotis are bright, cheery, welcoming people whose love of the restaurant business comes naturally, since they grew up in the business.

Marrying European fine dining with Greek cuisine, Ouzeri's eclectic menu is focused on quality, not volume. The kind of quality that will stir your fondest memories of home cooking. Sacrilegious though it sounds, Ouzeri's Avgolemono Soup will have you drawing favourable comparisons with your Bubie's chicken soup — high praise indeed.

Famed for their appetizers, Ouzeri also offers a number of intriguing entrées. Strydia Ouzeri is topped with spinach, tomato, kaseri cheese and Ouzeri's special sauce, then baked to perfection. Lamb rosemary pie, offered in your choice of lamb shank and feta or chicken with a rosemary and mushroom sauce enveloped in filo, is warmly recommended. The moussaka — both meat and vegetarian — is as good as it gets in GreekTown, and the seafood richly deserves the"authentically Greek" label you'll encounter everywhere on the Danforth. Fresh fish is available daily, and may feature Red Snapper, Sea Bass, Salmon, or whatever catch happens to be freshest on the day you visit.

Ouzeri's extensive Greek wine list has a selection that will perfectly complement any of the entrées, or stand on its own as an afterwork or after-dinner libation.

The service is friendly and extremely thorough, with ample wait staff to keep pace with your needs. Like the awnings, they're dressed in an extremely comforting shade of blue.

Whether you're looking for a quick bite or a long, pleasurable meal, Ouzeri's three levels of dining all convey the same gentle message: Relax. Relax. Relax.

"One of my favourite summer patios" — Saul Korman

"What do you think this is, a restaurant?"

If your mother's never issued this sharp retort, then either she's the best-natured matriarch on the face of the earth, or you're the child from heaven.

At Zorba's, owner and chef Kosta Carasoulos plays the role of Mom. But he's far too nice to pose this question — nor would you ever give him cause to.

Like your Mom, he cooks whatever he feels like cooking on any given day. What he puts on the table is what you get. Like an artist setting a fresh canvas, he goes wherever his brush takes him — cooking not from a formula, but from the heart.

Here it's easy to play the model customer. You're not limited you to one or two choices. The prolific Carasoulos gives you 10 to 20 selections, enticingly arrayed on a steam table. You choose what you're in the mood for and are generously served by one of seven or eight Carasoulos family members. "We have an informal family reunion here every day," jokes son Bobby.

They have menus here if you insist on à la carte, but unless you're ordering a fresh salad, a shish kebob or hamburgers and French fries for the kids, you can do just as well without them.

Heavenly scents beckon from the steam table. Today, there's lamb shank, lamb fricassee, roast chicken, roast potatoes, moussaka, pastitsio, green beans with zucchini, carrots, or cauliflower, soup, and a variety of other specialties. Tomorrow? Only Carasoulos knows. This is less a restaurant than a home kitchen feeding a huge extended family, of which you are now a de facto member. You can call ahead to see what's available, but why spoil the fun? Most of Zorba's customers just show up with an appetite and a smile.

Having each dish on piping hot display makes deciding what you want a lot easier; your taste buds respond better to these visual and aromatic stimuli than to any menu. Coming to Zorba's for the katsarola (Greek for "pot", a metaphor for home cooking) is like coming home to a holiday dinner that's ready to eat. You don't "order", you just pick out what you want from the steam table, sit down and tuck in. You can ask for a lot of this, and a little of that, and that's exactly what you'll get. If you don't specify quantities, however, you might need help carrying your plate.

That's the good news. The bad news is that once these mouthwatering homemade specialties are gone, they're gone. (You thought this was a restaurant?!) With an eager clientele weaned on home cooking, it's best to arrive early for best selection.

The service is courteous, but there are no grand formalities here — just the unassuming warmth of people who, like an old friend who never changes, are always easy to be with.

The prices are modest, to say the least. Rarely will you enjoy so much food for so little. That may explain why during the week, the take-out lineup sometimes rivals the sit-down crowd. You just can't cook at home for less.

Eating here will, however, rekindle all your good memories of home cooking and of a simpler time and place — before that age of innocence was eradicated by the inexorable march of time. It's a place most of us would dearly love to get back to, if only for an evening.

Here, you can.

Select Bakery marries past with present

It's traditional, yet modern.

It's grand, yet intimate.

Its resplendent array of baked goods will evoke your fondest childhood memories, but it can also take you forward in time with a futuristic cake design.

The Katsamakis family — father Emmanuel, sons Kosta and Nick, and daughter Areti — lead a cheery staff of skilled bakers and pastry chefs. A full range of traditional Greek, European and continental pastries (baklava, galaktoboureko, petits fours et al) is complemented by European breads, specialty cakes of the highest order, and sublime specialty coffees.

Row upon row of freshly-baked perfection awaits. You're in GreekTown, so try Select's signature Kalamata Olive bread. Get there early before it sells out. The European Village Bread — crusty on the outside, buttery soft on the inside — is also highly recommended.

What makes a baker tick? The good ones know their livelihood is more than a vocation, and understand its symbolism. The joy of providing sustenance at this elemental level has inspired poets and playwrights for thousands of years.

The baker's not the only one to appreciate the symbolic value of the process, however. For many, the act of buying bread has a meaning that transcends mere grocery shopping.

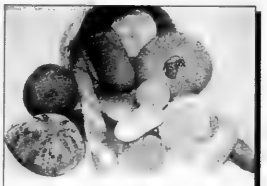
"There's a shared reverence," says Kosta Katsamakis. Inspiration alone, however, won't sustain a baker through the long hours and constant vigilance required to ensure that this bounty goes from conception to creation in a timely manner.

"Our customers keep us going," says Katsamakis. "In most bakeries the feedback is direct and continuous, particularly here with our open concept. Many restauranteurs and chefs don't get that feedback until well into the meal or after. Baked goods tend to produce an immediate reaction even before they're eaten, and that appreciation gives us a shot of adrenalin. Your customers' smiles of anticipation tell you they know their goodies will taste as good as the last time and the time before."

In addition to a wealth of baked goods, Select offers a repertoire of prepared foods. Moussaka, pastitsio, and many other entrées — plus the full gamut of Greek dips and sauces — are made fresh daily. Many entrées are available fresh or frozen, and most are suitable for freezing. Need to entertain on short notice? Select is a one-stop destination for party trays, rolls, and related comestibles. And its ultraconvenient location on Donlands just south of O'Connor has ample, inexpensive meter parking at the front door.

If breadmaking has symbolic significance, wedding cake making often denotes urgency and last-minute heroics. As the fitting conclusion to a wedding reception, the cake is often left to the end of the planning process. That may be the logical order of business for some couples and wedding planners, but for the baker it can be challenging. "Maximum creativity with minimum turnaround time," grins Katsamakis. Filling a wedding cake order can play out like an episode of 24, but saving the day against all odds "comes with the territory," he grins.

Spoken like a true baker.



GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Kalyvia's food or home cooking? Same thing.

Those who take issue with describing restaurant food as "home cooking" haven't eaten in Greek-Town lately. And they definitely haven't eaten at Kalyvia.

This apparent oxymoron is easily explained. "Home cooking" is not just the standard most restaurants aspire to: it is, in large part, the reason they exist. Go back one or two generations in any Greek restauranteur's family, and you'll find a home cooker who was famous in his or her home town or village. Go back 400 years, and you'll find a home cooker who wouldn't even know the meaning of the word "restaurant." Wouldn't even understand the concept.

420 DANFORTH AVE.
416 463-3333
WWW.KALYVIA.COM

What he or she might understand is that this "restaurant" is your only way of preserving the family legacy of home cooking in a world that's now too busy for many of us to pick up a frying pan, let alone use it.

In the case of Kalyvia and the Tsafatinos family, pride of ownership goes beyond upholding the family standard. It's about bragging rights. The World Cup of soccer's in an off year, but equally intense regional rivalries are ever-present in the culinary arena. Like, Kalyvia, Greece vs. Kalyvia, Greece, with the winner advancing to the next round vs... Kalyvia, Greece. That's right: with several towns of the same name, each boasting their own regional specialties, you've got to prove your mettle on the domestic front before you can represent your country.

The competition is good-natured, of course, but underpinning the friendly banter is genuine pride. Coming from the Tsafatinos' home town and being unable to cook is like coming from Venice and being unable to stay upright in a gondola.

The high esteem in which the Tsafatinos family is held by their customers is mirrored by the respect from their peers. Like most GreekTown restauranteurs, they adhere to the unwritten rule that mutual support trumps oneupmanship.

"Is our souvlaki good?", says Jimmy Tsafatinos. "Yes. Is our moussaka great? Yes. Are our dips amazing? We like to think so. But we can say our food is good without putting ourselves on a pedestal, or saying we're better than our neighbours. It's up to the customer to decide who's best. If you're too busy pounding your chest, then you're not spending enough time listening to your customers. And no one likes a prima donna."

Humility is an important part of the GreekTown restaurant psyche, he explains. "We're happy to be one of many good restaurants with something to offer. We work together to create a family environment, an area that everyone will enjoy coming to. One night they might eat here, the next night at our neighbour's. As long as they come to GreekTown, we're happy."

Kalyvia gives GreekTown-goers plenty of reasons to choose them. Their main dining room affords comfort and privacy, and is a great spot for milestone events. Their lively patio is always in demand. Dining in? Their take-out orders receive the same care and attention to detail as their sit-down dining, and they offer local delivery.

Now, as to which town of Kalyvia cooks better than the next town of Kalyvia...that's a case where humility may take a back seat to oneupsmanship. It's a rivalry everyone can get with — a tasting competition in which no holds are barred, no one takes themselves too seriously, and the customer always wins.

Exactly as it should be.

Culinary art worthy of the Louvre at Pappas

"The art of Mediterranean cuisine" is a ubiquitous phrase in culinary circles. For Pappas Grill it's doubly relevant.

In 1988, founders Bill and Meropi Klianis were sourcing a new location for their art gallery (Williams Gallery at Yonge and Eglinton) when they stumbled on a sprawling space in the heart of GreekTown. Too large and too ambitious for their small gallery — but too loaded with restaurant potential to pass up — the serendipitous space wooed the Klianis family from one art form to another.

A lengthy and painstaking transformation ensued under the direction of architect Robert Chan of Hirschberg Design Group, with considerable input from Bill and Meropi. The breathtaking result instantly captured the fancy of a dining public eager for an eclectic departure from traditional Greek menus.

440 Danforth Avenue
www.pappasgrill.com

"We didn't want to open just another Greek restaurant," says daughter Jane Klianis, who with brother John now oversees all of the restaurant's day-to-day operations. "There was no point in duplicating what was already being done by our neighbours." In the art world, if you bring nothing new to the table, you're either uninspired or a copycat. Clearly, the Klianis family's art experience transmuted to their restaurant ethos.

Pappas' winning mix of elegant Mediterranean dining in an airy, light-filled, tri-level dining room has captivated GreekTown goers since Day One, not only for the quality of its cuisine but also for its unique ability to adapt to any occasion or mood. It's fine dining, yet casual and relaxed. It affords privacy, yet provides sweeping sightlines. It's the epicentre of GreekTown activity — letting the outside in like a beautifully landscaped public square disguised as a restaurant — yet it's a secluded shelter in which to pause and reflect.

Jane and John keep close tabs on all aspects of the business, but are careful not to micromanage — especially with their chefs. "Artistic people need artistic license," smiles Jane. "If you take that away their freedom, you stultify their creativity. We buy market fresh ingredients every day, give them to our chefs, and tell them to make something wonderful."

The result is always novel and often spectacular, she says. "Our customers look to us for new taste experiences. That doesn't mean changing the menu every six months, it means creating a complete new set of dinner specials every week."

These take the form of a seven-day Prix Fixe menu which revitalizes your palate without devitalizing your portfolio. $25 gets you a choice of hot or cold soup, two appetizers, and four entrées. That's exceptional value for any fine restaurant, let along one that racks up awards like others rack lamb.

Speaking of this Mediterranean staple, there's more care and attention to detail in Pappas' Oven-Roasted Lamb Shank than in some entire menus we've seen. Slow roasted for eight hours in Greek oregano, fresh garlic and spices, it stews longer in its own juices than your mother-in-law after a putdown of her cooking. The Pappas Rigatoni (spicy homemade Greek sausage, sweet peppers and garlic with feta, parmesan and kefalotiri cheese in a rich white wine cream sauce) has seen more than one Italian chef add Opa! to his vocabulary. The Mediterranean Shrimp sautéed in white wine is a seafood relevation.

Pappas cooks most of its dishes in extra-virgin olive oil, but the extra cost of this and other premium ingredients like white wine is not reflected in its prices. "Using fresh, pure ingredients isn't a "bonus," says Jane, "it's standard. You don't like a contractor cutting corners on your house; we don't cut corners in creating your meal."

All Pappas' dishes are made fresh from scratch on the premises. No MSG, additives or preservatives are used — ever. "Mediterranean cuisine in its pure state is intrinsically healthy," says Klianis. "We keep it that way."

Drtto for the Saturday and Sunday continental Brunch, where you can enjoy eggs in any style imaginable. Try the three-egg Omelette Onassis filled with artichokes, topped with smoked salmon, drizzled with avgolemono dill sauce, and served with Greek salad.

Fame may be fleeting, but not at Pappas Grill. If so, its cameo appearance in My Big Fat Greek Wedding would be long forgotten. Truth is, Pappas' cuisine had made a lasting impression on the Toronto dining consciousness long before its foliated frontage lit up the silver screen.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Can you bottle and sell relaxation? 521 has.

To the naked eye, 521 Danforth Avenue (corner Ferrier) is an attractive bar café with dual patios. Once seated and warmly greeted by your server, however, you sense there's more here than meets the eye. A half hour into your visit, it dawns on you. Relaxation isn't just a byproduct of the experience here; it is the experience. So much so that you'd swear it's being bottled and sold on the premises. In a tizzy? 521 will extract you from it. Got troubles? 521 will chase them. However challenging your day, 521 will smooth out its rough edges.

This relaxation landscape is no accident; Lambros and Frank Babatsikos planned it that way. From the layout to the colour scheme to the architectural design, 521 breathes relaxation from every pore. 521 is far too down to earth — and its prices too modest — to offer valet parking. One thing they do guarantee, however, is a happy ending to forgot-where-you-parked syndrome. You'll park your stress at the door when you arrive, and you won't find it when you leave.

Most Danforth establishments have a loyal core clientele. This is particularly true of 521. Over the course of several visits, you'll see a lot of familiar faces here. Engage the regulars in conversation, and they'll give you 521 good reasons to make this your destination of choice. (Saul Korman may give you 569). The best beverages money can buy, at prices that are easy on your pocketbook. Delicious light meals prepared fresh to order. And an ambience that wouldn't let you tense up even if you tried to.

Since opening Café 521 in 1999, the Babatsikos brothers have renovated it twice. The most recent iteration, courtesy of George Foussias of Hirschberg Design, has elevated the trendy spot to iconic status. It comines diverse elements into a harmonious whole. The bar and seating area at front, the dining area midway, the back patio and private lounge at rear are connected by three huge portals. The resulting depth perspective affords guests a telescopic view of the street.

The Danforth on a warm summer day is reminiscent of many European cities. On such days, 521 feels a bit like Venice: hot and cool at the same time. In the modernesque front lounge you can feel the city's heartbeat. A few yards away on the more traditional back patio, you might as well be beachside. It's as close to perfect relaxation as this imperfect world gets. Toronto's finest scotches, martinis and specialty mixed beverages — as well as the tasty fare — make 521 an ideal gathering spot. It's hard to spend a fortune here given the prices, but what you do spend will give you a better return on your investment than any Fortune 500 company.

For small groups seeking total privacy for their party or business lunch, the rear lounge provides the required seclusion.

Whether you're looking to enjoy a quick lunch or an after-dinner drink — or turn a relaxing dinner into a very relaxing evening — this hot spot gives you 521 reasons to chill out.

Sun Valley a paradise for food shoppers

If you value quality, hate spending hours schlepping through faceless supermarkets and need more than the corner store can offer, Sun Valley Fine Foods is tailor-made for you.

Larger than a neighbourhood European food store, yet small enough to navigate your way through quickly, Sun Valley is boutique food shopping at its very finest. Just about every sought-after brand name is here, from gourmet grocery items to breads, cakes and pastries. And if there's a hot new product on the market, you'll find it here first.

The produce here is simply spectacular. The fruit has fewer blemishes than the average Hollywood actress. The meat, fish and poultry are exquisite, a boon to homemakers and BBQ enthusiasts alike.

Unlike most supermarkets that include high-end brand names and quality as part of their overall mix, Sun Valley sells nothing but quality. You won't have to sift through five brands to find one good one. And the layout of the store lends itself to ease and efficiency, with the produce, bakery and grocery areas surrounding a central meat department. You'll find exactly what you need for your family and special occasion dining with friendly, knowledgeable personal service.

It's these attributes which keep customers coming back — not only the locals, but shoppers from North York, Thornhill, and even Richmond Hill, armed with the temperature-controlled bags that have become standard equipment among shoppers willing to go the extra mile for the very best.

People come from outside GreekTown to shop Sun Valley "for the same reasons they patronize the restaurants," says Spiro Aravantinos: "quality, freshness, flavour, and value."

Ah yes, value. What Aravantinos doesn't mention — but what's common knowledge among Sun Valley shoppers — is that they've resisted "snob appeal". In true GreekTown spirit, they've kept their prices affordable even as their reputation has continued to grow.

The bottom line is that under this one roof you'll find exactly what you want in less time — yet at a more leisurely pace — than in the "big box" supermarkets. And, if you're a husband who'se been "commissioned" to bring home the groceries, your chances of getting a glowing report card on arrival are better here than just about anywhere else.

The reason is simple. Sun Valley just doesn't sell anything that won't get the spousal seal of approval — no matter how hard that may be to come by in your household.

This Palace opens its doors and heart like no other restaurant

It has the easiest parking access of any restaurant in GreekTown. The Palace sits adjacent to a large Green P municipal lot bordered by the restaurant's north wall. It's the only lot in the area to offer both open and covered parking.

Peter Hadjis, wife Stella, sister Olga and son John don't just operate a family business, they preside over a Danforth institution. "Don't say that," laughs John. "That puts me in the wrong age bracket." They have held court over this Kingdom for almost 30 years.

THE PALACE RESTAURANT
722 Pape Avenue
416.462.1166
www.eatatpalace.com

The Palace is like no other GreekTown restaurant. How does it differ?

It's off the main drag, a few steps north of Danforth on Pape. As you'll soon discover, it's not just the location that sets it apart.

Its seafaring décor — complete with fully functional structural wooden posts and beams — emits a cocoon-like calm that envelopes you the moment you enter. More of the same in the upstairs party room, which flings open wide the shutters of its many windows to admit a flood of sunlight.

And what royal fare will you be served in this Palace?

This is indulgence to make King Henry VIII blush. You'll dine like Kings and Queens, but without the pomp and ceremony.

Nor is royal impatience recommended. A feast of this calibre takes time to prepare, and time to enjoy. The only food to arrive almost immediately is a complimentary plate of appetizers. For the rest, you'll have to wait — and the wait is worth it.

The Palace is not a place to dine and dash. If you do eat and run, be prepared for some hurt looks.

Amid the changing seasons and the transition from one generation to the next, the Palace is a Danforth constant. It is, in the words of a famous Anonymous poet, "as perennial as the grass."

In the quality of food served here; in the care with which it's prepared; in the gratitude shown for even the smallest acknowledgement; the Palace embodies, like no other Danforth establishment, the spirit of GreekTown.

Here, time stands still, in the best possible sense.

Overnight sensations come and go. The Palace is forever.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Love your menu: at Pan, every dish is a favourite son

Traditional or nouveau? Light or filling? Spicy or mild?

The culinary preferences of your family or party generally determine where you dine. Unanimity is rare. Concensus rules. Inevitably, someone will have to compromise.

Pan, however, doesn't believe in compromises. Its universal appeal stems not from a huge menu or from a middle-of-the-road approach, but from an ability to render each item on its menu appealing to diverse tastes. This means injecting flair into traditional dishes while respecting tradition in signature offerings.

In practical terms, that means Pan's moussaka never tastes "same old same old", its lamb chops are always prepared and presented with panache, while its signature Santorini Chicken appeals even to diehard traditionalists.

Says Chris Christodoulou, "In this business, you're only as good as your last dish. Every dish you make is the most important one you've ever made." It also means treating every item on the menu like it's the chef's special. "You can't recommend one dish and hope the customer doesn't pick something else. A menu is like a family with many children. You must love, respect and stand behind each one equally."

So adept is Pan at "nurturing" its menu that you can probably order any item at any given time with full confidence that it will shine.

And in order to encourage their always-steady traffic flow to continue unabated, they continue to offer their popular Pan Fest specials (lunch $19, dinner $25). Live music and belly dancing Friday and Saturday complete the sensory experience.

Like the menu, the décor achieves maximum impact from each diverse element. More is accomplished here in less space than in any other restaurant we know of. It's cozy and intimate, yet never feels crowded even when full. Its regular clientele is loyal not only to its high standards, but also to Chrstodoulou and wife Soula, whose youthful appearance belies the fact they've served GreekTown-goers since the year Aleph.

The Christodoulous attribute their fountain of youth to perpetual motion. "You know what they say, grins Chris: "Don't look back; something might be gaining on you."

With a menu that all members of your dining party can look forward to, this is one restaurant where you won't need a rear view mirror. Pan doesn't just serve Mediterranean food; they bring it to life.

New digs, great food get life back on the Rails

Len Grammenopoulos

How do you create a casual dining enfironment that is both animated and subdued, rollicking and peaceful?

If you're Rails And Ales, you move four blocks west to a new, cozier location that is actually more accessible and easier to get to by car. You renovate the premises completely in an eclectic style that combines the best of old English with modern upscale casual. Then you invert the former rails-to-ales ratio to shift the emphasis from bar to restaurant, while never losing sight of the convivial atmosphere, quality and value that made you successful in the first place.

GUINNESS RAILS AND ALES
1106 Danforth Avenue • 416-462-9555

And, if you're proprietor Lenny Grammenopoulos, your dual-hat life of restauranteur / sports reporter just got crazier than ever.

The new Rails And Ales at 1106 Danforth Avenue, just west of Donlands, is a significant upgrade. A deep wooden patio sets a welcoming stage. The interior is predominately dark oak, from the strip hardwood flooring to the comfortable chairs and tables (solid enough to drive a truck over), flanked by an exposed brick wall. A strategically-positioned giant-screen TV allows you to keep an eye on the game, if you want to. A solitary billard table adds a touch of gentility to an aristocratically panelled ante room. The south-facing frontage bathes the strong, dark interior in a gentle glow.

The colour scheme was carefully planned, says Grammenopoulos, to offer calm seclusion from life's storm. "Whatever edge you might bring in with you, this will take it down a notch," he smiles.

The menu is traditional pub casual with a few Greek twists like Greek Wings and Greek Fries, as well as mainstream Greek dishes like souvlaki and salads, and of course their famous juicy home-made burgers. But, says Grammenopoulos, "there is nothing casual about our approach to food. This is GreekTown. Whether you're coming for a few drinks and a snack or a family dinner, you expect quality and value and that's what you'll get. Just because it isn't so-called "fine dining" and just because you may be paying less doesn't mean you expect less, nor should you."

As a fan of Toronto sports teams we've become used to diminished expectations, so this is a welcome change.

As its name suggests, Rails And Ales offers a terrific variety of both domestic and imported beer, both bottled and on tap. So you'll rarely have to settle for second or third choices here, as you often must in traditional restaurants. Odds are Rails And Ales will have your first choice.

The long hours involved in running a restaurant are already challenging without a media career added to the mix. So it's somewhat ironic that the recently-married Grammenopoulos might be the last person able to kick back and enjoy the relaxing ambience he's created. But the dual demands are "all good", he says.

"For my lifestyle and personality, the restaurant business and sports media are a perfect fit. I've always been a people person so I feed off the interaction. It's work but it's also play, if you let it be." Besides, he says, his father and partner Alkis is "traditionally Greek. In other words, he doesn't cut me any slack, and working two jobs is no excuse for taking an off day. If anything, it just creates more pressure to perform."

On 11/11/11, witness the 3-D epic battle as mere men become Immortals.

Eons after the Gods won their mythic struggle against the Titans, a new evil threatens the land. Mad with power, King Hyperion (Mickey Rourke) has declared war against humanity. Amassing a bloodthirsty army of soldiers disfigured by his own hand, Hyperion has scorched Greece in search of the legendary Epirus Bow, a weapon of unimaginable power forged in the heavens by Ares.

Only he who possesses this bow can unleash the Titans, who have been imprisoned deep within the walls of Mount Tartaros since the dawn of time and thirst for revenge. In the King's hands, the bow would rain destruction upon mankind and annihilate the Gods. But ancient law dictates the Gods must not intervene in man's conflict. They remain powerless to stop Hyperion...until a peasant named Theseus (Henry Cavill) comes forth as their only hope.

Secretly chosen by Zeus, Theseus must save his people from Hyperion and his hordes. Rallying a band of fellow outsiders — including visionary priestess Phaedra (Freida Pinto) and cunning slave Stavros (Stephen Dorff) — one hero will lead the uprising, or watch his homeland fall into ruin and his Gods vanish into legend.

Salon can't move or stay put — so does both

bob + paige SALON

412 Danforth Ave.
bobandpaige.com

You're bob + paige salon and in three short years, your growth has stretched your capacity to the limit. You love your current location and ambience, as do your customers. Leaving it for larger premises elsewhere would scatter in the winds the positive energy that helped you grow in the first place.

You can't expand the current premises; you're surrounded on all five sides (top, bottom, left, right, back). You can't set up chairs on the sidewalk and pretend it's okay (though your waiting list has grown so, your customers might go along with it).

After some deep meditation and non-linear thinking, the solution dawns on you. Who says you have to expand into adjacent premises? Find the closest available spot you can inject with the same sparkle and way-cool vibe. A place within a stone's... er, hairbrush throw.

Once the solution revealed itself, bringing it to fruition was child's play. Before you could say "Paige cut". Frank and partner Violet Volovik had staked their claim on a cool spot a few blocks away, and the twin sister of bob + paige was conceived.

Delivery is scheduled for early September. "That's the perfect-world solution", laughs Vi. "We won't open until everything is right — hopefully before the holidays."

Without a dedicated staff richly deserving of the opportunity to spread their wings and fly solo, "this expansion doesn't happen," affirms Frank. "We'll take a bit of the credit for hand-picking our assistants based on their passion for haircutting and the right attitude. But given the opportunity, they still had to take it and run with it."

"They sprinted", interjects Vi. "In this business, talented employees often leave to start their own shop. From Day One, we tried to create a working environment that would encourage good people to stay on the farm. Now, thanks to their dedication and our great customers, we get to be their greener pastures."

And where exactly is this verdant meadow?

The new digs are already taking shape a few blocks west of their current location. The same team that made the existing bob + paige a stirring design success is hard at work dressing the twin sister to ensure she shines with the same radiance. "This is the only way we could do it," says Frank. "We vowed never to become a factory, never to dilute ourselves. This allows us to get bigger while remaining small. We are still a boutique shop."

The salon may be in expansionary mode, but the trend in today's haircutting is contractional. Shorter cuts are in now, from shoulder length right on up to pixie and Pompadour cuts. Having a smaller volume of hair to work with shifts the onus from styling to precision cutting, says Frank. "There's less margin for error. You can't "hide" a mistake on a shorter cut."

Bob + paige has always sourced the market for the healthiest, most nourishing hair products available. This year, they hit the mother lode in the new Sojourn line by Elan Sassoon. These shampoos and conditioners boast a purity level and a scientifically defined PH balance unprecedented in the industry. They are free of paraben, formaldehyde, gluten, alcohol, and artificial colour and are thus 100% biodegradable. What's more, unlike many commercial hair products nebulously labeled "balanced PH" (a scientifically meaningless term) — each Sojourn product is formulated in hair's optimum PH range, 4.5 to 5.5.

For bob + paige and their customers, having a twin sister in the same neighbourhood is a best-case scenario. We can hardly wait to visit her.

Fit, quality and style harmonize at Blue Shoe Box

That's the store we're talking about; we haven't even slipped on a shoe yet!

Fortuitously, the shoes offered here are the aesthetic equal of the shop that sells them. In 2002 proprietor Eliséo (Tony) Staffiere opened The Blue Shoe Box at 499 Danforth just east of Logan. In a highly competitive market, it has earned a reputation not only for the quality it carries, but also for its ability to ensure a glove-like fit. Jeanne Beker ranked it among Toronto's top 100 fashion stores (clothing or shoes) for 2010.

Staffiere isn't just a shoe salesman; he's the youngest in a family of Italian shoemakers dating back three generations.

Drawing on this experience, he designs and fabricates his own lines for women and men under the FAST and Eliséo Staffiere labels, respectively. Made in Italy to his exacting specifications, these seductively stylish shoes and boots offer exquisite quality and style at hundreds of dollars less than comparable designer shoes. If you enjoy wearing the best without the high price tag, check them out. No one will know they're not Bloor Street trophy shoes unless you tell them.

The superior construction and workmanship of these private label shoes is immediately apparent. With soles double stitched inside out and kid lining, the men's shoe is as rugged outside as it is gentle inside. Ditto for the ladies'. You couldn't wear these out even if you wanted to.

In addition to its private label, The Blue Shoe Box carries a number of leading name brands for men and women. For a small store, the selection is amazing.

Today's men and women, notes Staffiere, want it all: quality, style, and comfort at reasonable prices. "You wear a pair of shoes more than any outfit. Most people put more miles on their shoes than on their car," he smiles. "All the more reason to be good to your feet."

Without quality built in, says Staffiere, a shoe that fits perfectly today may not hold its shape tomorrow. And without the perfect fit, "even a shoe made of spun gold won't help you."

"The margin for error in fitting a shoe is zero," he smiles. "It's not like a shirt or a dress where you can get away with a quarter inch. It also bears your weight, which your clothing doesn't. Every time you take a step or move your feet, your shoes are flexing to accommodate you. They're like a personal limousine."

The Blue Shoe Box occupies a diminutive space, but its design is magical. The elongated, reed-thin premises — a metaphor for a long, slender foot perhaps? — house an intricately moulded 120-year-old copper ceiling, cappuccino spaccoed walls, exposed red brick, butterscotch oak shelving and a gleaming hardwood floor. It's a soothing environment in which to test drive a new limo...er, pair of shoes.

If the shoe fits, wear it. More and more Torontonians are finding that fit at the right price in an Italian-made Blue Shoe Box.

Horvath's timeless, poetic images evoke Keats

"Beauty is truth, truth beauty — That is all / Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know."

Sam Sciarrino of Horvath Photography understands the simple eloquence of this principle. He lives it. The portraits which grace the walls of his studio attest to it. A true photographic artist, his credentials include Master's degrees in photography from both Canada and the U.S. as well as numerous awards (most recently, the 2010 SWPP Wedding Traditional Photographer of the Year and the 2010 Award of Excellence, Wedding & Portrait Photographers International). Sciarrino has also lectured on photography at major universities on two continents.

7540 Weston Road Unit 7

He's been the go-to guy for some of Toronto's highest-profile weddings, yet he's sufficiently down-to-earth that his fees remain highly competitive. As long as his work speaks to his clients, he's happy. "Each piece must tell a story," he muses. "A good novel tells a story. A photograph should be held to the same standard."

Good special event photographers are unobtrusive; the great ones are virtually invisible. Apart from the posed shots, you hardly see them, and that's how it should be, says Sciarrino. "On your wedding day, you and your guests don't need to see your photographer doing cartwheels," he says. "If he's quietly going about his business, hopefully you'll be the one doing cartwheels when you see the proofs."

Scarrino has a special affinity for ethnic weddings and other ethnocultural ceremonies. "It's a privilege to photograph the milestone events of people from other cultures," he says. "It means they judge you on merit. I've always made a point of doing my homework to vindicate their trust. You have to know the steps and timelines in each ceremony and prepare accordingly."

The rapid advances in digital technology have tempted some clients to pay less by hiring "weekend warriors" or by taking their own pictures. The regret factor is frequent and irreversible, says Sciarrino. "Your wedding, bar mitzvah or baptism is not a dress rehearsal," he sighs. "You don't get a do-over. There is no consolation in learning that you get what you pay for when you're left with bad photos and bad memories."

Those memories are only as good as the eye behind the lens. What does the artist's eye see that ours doesn't? The distinction lies not so much in the perception as in the ability to frame, capture, and commit to memory the visual beauty that unfolds in the twinkling of an eye.

Sciarrino's greatest satisfaction is when the shots that move him the most are also the ones that resonate with his clients. "When you connect on that level, it's magic."

Beauty is truth, truth beauty. On that score, Scarrino and a score of satisfied customers clearly agree.

Little David asking for a haircut? Believe it.

If waving a magic wand could make little David brush his teeth without being asked, take a bath voluntarily, and relish getting his hair cut, would you wave it?

So would we.

At Melonhead on the Danforth, you don't have to. They do it for you.

They achieve this presto change-o effect by creating a styling environment that's so much fun, little David will remind you when he needs a haircut.

Is is a salon or an amusement park? It's both. The fun begins with the vintage 1952 carousel horse out front, gathers momentum with a wildly colourful interior reminiscent of jumbo jelly beans, and peaks with theme seats in lieu of chairs. There's a space ship, a police motorcycle, a carousel horse, two airplanes, and a highly coveted Thomas The Tank engine. Once the kids are safely ensconced, they can watch TV on wall-mounted screens.

Elliptical mirrors and counters that are also suggestive of jelly beans — and caring licensed stylists who may sing to your kids, blow bubbles or both — further escalate the fun fest.

Hard-pressed to find a good children's salon for her own son and daughter, Rosanna Spina opened Melonhead in November 2010. Her assumption that other parents shared her salon-hunting blues was quickly confirmed. To date she's enjoyed a steady flow of the youngest clientele this side of a nursery.

What's been even more gratifying than the business success is the ear-to-ear smiles occasioned by the Melonhead experience. "My goal was to offer a fun setting that would provide a calming distraction," she says. "But the sheer joy of the kids has exceeded my expectations. They love coming here."

Not every child readily goes with the flow, of course. For those who don't, for toddlers who need to be held or supported, and for older children, there's an adult chair. Spina's expert staff will also style parents' hair on request, provided their children's approval is secured first.

Melonhead's haircutting prices range from $21 for a wash, blow dry, cut and style to $35 for party hair. They also use and sell their own line of natural shampoos, conditioners, gels, and an incredibly effective detangler that is popular among all ages.

The Danforth has always been family-friendly, with an abundance of great restaurants and a ubiquity of ice cream. With Melonhead, it's friendlier still. Whether you've come to dine, to shop, or just to stroll, your child's haircut can now be part of a family outing rather than a chore.

At most salons, getting your children into the chair is half the battle. At Melonhead on the Danforth, it's getting them out that's challenging.

Crofter's: pure gold in a bottle

So simple, yet so refined. So sweet, yet so subtle. So much a part of growing up and, as we age, a timeless reminder of the simple pleasures of youth.

Among the foods ubiquitous in Western culture — crossing all age groups and ethnicities — jam ranks right up there with butter. Many of us were practically reared on peanut butter and jam sandwiches, both as a lunchtime staple and anytime snack. For some, toast without jam is unthinkable. Afternoon tea without fruit preserves to slather on our biscuits and scones? Unfathomable.

Enter Crofter's, a manufacturer with an old-world penchant for homemade goodness and a new-age commitment to health and the environment. In their state-of-the-art plant in Parry Sound, Ontario, Crofter's turns nature's fanciest, freshest hand-picked fruit into pure gold in a bottle.

Even to call Crofter's a manufacturer, however, is to somehow diminish their boutiquey attention to detail and quality. One half expects to turn a corner and find Mom hard at work, hand-bottling each jar.

It takes all of two seconds to taste the Crofter's difference. Nothing in life is perfect, but in the realm of jam, jelly, or "fruit spreads", as Crofter's calls them, this is close. Not too tart, not too sweet, fairly bursting with flavour, they bring out the best in everything they cover — bread, crackers, and scones — even a dab on your grandmother's sponge cake, when she's not looking.

There's a very practical reason for Crofter's superior taste and "Superfruit Spread" moniker: more fruit. While conventional manufacturers often label their products "more fruit", "double fruit", and so on, that simply means more than or double the fruit in their own or other conventional products, which often contain scads of refined sugar and very little actual fruit. When Crofter's says "fruit spread", they mean Fruit. Each jar of Superfruit spread is stuffed with one pound of premium organic fruit. There are four unique flavour combinations, sourced from around the world. Each certified organic spread is sweetened with fair trade sugar and contains one-third less sugar than jam. Experience these different cultural tastes while getting your daily dose of antioxidants.

Add to this exquisite natural taste the comfort zone of certified organic production, and you have a gem of a product. Yet Crofter's jams are generally priced lower than competitive organic brands and, in some cases, even lower than conventional, non-organic brands.

Sold at The Big Carrot and other better health food stores, and in the health food section of selected supermarkets and specialty food stores, Crofter's fruit spreads are pure gold in a bottle.

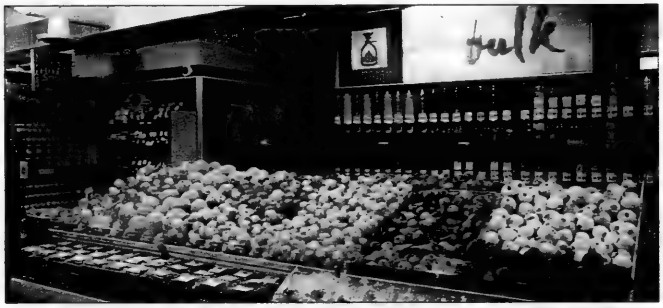
Big Carrot certified by Ecocert Canada: over 1,000 products and counting



If you have a favourite store that gives you great service, you tend to keep shopping there — especially when part of that service is the expert advice needed to make an informed purchase. The Big Carrot has become that destination store for an entire generation, and its customers have reciprocated with a level of loyalty unparalleled in the retail food business.

If you shop at The Big Carrot, you'll understand why it doesn't "feel" quite like any other store: it isn't. It's businesslike, but in no way "corporate"; the personal touch is ever-present. Because it's a worker-owned co-op, its members have an all-for-one and one-for-all attitude and never lose sight of the big picture: putting the customer first.

The Big Carrot is really three stores in one: a health food store and market; a holistic dispensary; and an organic juice, coffee and sandwich bar. It caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, non-GMO. Many of these products are also Kosher-certified.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods. Its extensive paraben-free body care department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

On June 30, 2009, the Organic Products Regulations (OPR) came into effect, making the new Canadian Organic Standards (COS) mandatory. The OPR legally requires organic products to be certified according to the COS if they are traded across provincial or international borders or use the long-anticipated Canada Organic Logo. This label is your assurance that the product bearing it has met the Canadian government's regulatory requirements for organic products.

The Big Carrot is Ontario's first retailer to certify to the new Canadian Organic standard, underscoring its 27-year commitment to good organic stewardship. Ecocert Canada has certified The Big Carrot to process and package over 700 organic products in its juice bar, bulk, spice, cheese and produce departments. The vegetarian deli is also certified to offer more than 30 fresh organic dishes and baked goods daily.

Retailer certification is not required by the CFIA, but at The Big Carrot it is seen as an important part of preserving the integrity of the entire supply chain. "We see our certification as our responsibility, to both our producers and our customers, to ensure that the hard work of the organic farmer is being preserved," notes Big Carrot Standards coordinator Maureen Kirkpatrick.

For natural and organic pastas, breads, buns, bagels, flatbreads, cookies, muffins, and other wholesome nosherie, no other store — or bakery, for that matter — even comes close. There are literally dozens of choices here, many of them wheat-free, dairy-free, Kosher-certified — or a combination thereof. Rudi's organic Kosher breads have been a hit for their incredible flavour and moisture.

Other Kosher-certified products, to name but a few: Sunflower Kitchen dips, pesto and soups; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Nature's Path Organic Cereals; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Amy's soups, pizzas and frozen entrées; Italian Volcano Lemon Juice; Enjoy Life Nut and Gluten Free Cereals, Cookies and Snack Bars; Camino Chocolate Bars; and an immense variety of chips and other snack foods.

The Big Carrot houses Toronto's only certified organic juice bar. There are over 50 choices of juices, blender drinks, nutritional boosts, shakes, and Fair Trade, Bird Friendly organic coffees, as well as sandwiches and other treats.

The Big Carrot has remained the leader in an increasingly crowded field by offering products that are as good for the environment as they are for its customers, and by providing a level of expertise and personal service unmatched in the industry. It also demonstrates its environmental friendliness by heating its water tank with solar panels and reducing its carbon footprint with the creation of the Carrot Common Green Roof. This education-oriented community hub centre accommodates community groups wishing to learn and evolve where urban dwelling meets natural diversity. Visit carrotgreenroof.ca.

Through its ongoing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit. It's an oasis of calm amid the chaos of everyday life. A visit here isn't just grocery, supplement and cosmetics shopping; it's a balm to the spirit.

Two generations of Kormans (who else?) expound or

Want to see a suit salesman riled up? Just ask Saul Korman about Casual Friday. "Tell me something," he barks. "You're going into the hospital for life-saving surgery. Your surgeon is wearing jeans. Are you okay with that?"

Like Al Pacino in Scent Of A Woman, he's just getting warmed up. "We're not all surgeons, but we're all professionals in our chosen field, and should dress accordingly. If you're an accountant for a major firm and one of the big banks is coming in, are you going to be wearing jeans?"

Son Shawn, while more measured, concurs. "You don't have to wear a suit for every client, but there's nothing wrong with looking your best for every client and every situation," he says. "Turn it around. When you're the customer and the person you're seeing is wearing jeans, maybe that says you're not as important to him as you'd like to be. Not exactly a message you'd want to receive, or give."

Ironically, the trend that has allowed a growing number of men to dress down in the workplace hasn't hurt Korry's suit sales. "More and more young men are coming in for suits," says Saul. "Casual wear has its place and our casual wear selection has never been greater. But nothing makes a statement like a suit. No matter what your business, no matter who you're seeing, you can't go wrong with a suit. Some people say suits aren't comfortable. Well, how comfortable is underdressing and then having to worry about what you're wearing? You put it on a suit, a nice crisp shirt and a tie, and you can forget about it. No matter who you meet during the course of your day, you're covered. That's what I call comfort. It also says that you're serious about your work. Dressing casually may suggest to those who don't know you that you take your work casually. Can you afford that?"

"And the compliments you get when you wear a suit can't hurt your confidence," adds Shawn. "You'll never go wrong dressing as if you were meeting your most important customer. And how about your colleagues? We sometimes take them for granted. If they're pleasantly surprised to see you in a suit, maybe you should wear one more often."

For Shawn, now into his third year as a full-time clothier, a previous career with the Teamsters Union seems like a distant memory, as does a stint as a CEO and celebrity bodyguard. "The only thing I'm capable of bodyguarding these days is our biscotti jar," he grins.

Slimming suit to the rescue. To that end, today's slim, tapered cuts are a friend in need to any man who's put on a few pounds.

"Many of us need help," says Shawn. I need help. I've put on a few and even with my background I'm not immune to weight gain. These slim fits accentuate a good physique and improve an average one. They won't take off 30 pounds if you're overweight, but they'll slim you down if you're borderline. If you're already trim they'll enhance your profile."

"There's no keeping a good look down. The suit is king"

But there's no thinning out the credit that's due Shawn's colleagues at Korry's, he owns. He's quick to acknowledge not only father Saul but also general manager Franco Gagliardi for their mentorship: the latter for his expertise and assistance on the sales floor, the former for his keen business acumen and ability to dispense advice on all aspects of the clothing business, no matter how small. From the pleat on a pant to the lie of a lapel, no detail escapes him. "That's a euphemism for micromanagement," chuckles Shawn. Saul deflects the barb with a dismissive wave.

On a serious note, Shawn says he's grateful to draw on his mentors' combined 100+ years of experience in the menswear trade. "If you can't learn from Saul and Franco, you can't learn from anyone."

And learn they do at 569 Danforth. This well-oiled menswear machine relies on each moving part for optimum performance. "Every member of our team is critical to our success, especially the unsung heroes — the tailors. Without them, nothing fits perfectly. Remember that old joke about the Shabbos suit? It's true. The small fortune we spend on advertising is wasted if customers walk out of here in ill-fitting garments. People wearing your product is advertising. It isn't "paid" advertising in the traditional sense but if you don't get it right it can be more expensive than any airtime or space buy."

Speaking of "free" advertising, both Kormans scoff at the new-school notion that you can promote your brand solely through Facebook, Twitter, and word of mouth.

"There's no free lunch," says Saul. "Those who are unwilling to spend money to promote their business are either shortsighted or naive." Enjoins Shawn, "those vehicles are extremely useful, but they're the dessert, not the main course. If Dad hadn't aggressively promoted this business from Day One, he might still be the lonely Jewish tailor on the Danforth, waiting for customers."

Saul touched on the lonely Jewish tailor theme in a recent address to 1,000 attendees at the Toronto Congress Centre, where he was honoured by the Retail Council Of Canada with the 2011 Ambassador Award "In Recognition Of Your Remarkable Contribution To Your Community And The Canadian Retail Industry." It would be premature to call this award the icing on Korman's career cake, however. For a man who's been the subject of retirement speculation for ten years now, he's lost none of his passion for the menswear business. "Love your trade, and it will love you back," he says.

"If you're as excited about menswear as we are, you're a candidate to join our team."

"I have slowed down though," he winks. "I just keep talking fast so no one will notice."

The truth is, Saul's actually in better shape physically than at this same time last year, thanks to some corrective surgery on his neck. Can we safely assume that the surgeon shops at Korry's? "He'd better," cracks Korman, "or I'll take my neck across the street next time. I can tell you he's great at what he does, and he does not wear jeans — at least not in the operating room."

ssador Award

Good thing too. There's nothing a surgeon needs less when scrubbing up than a Casual Friday lecture.

Colourful characters, colourful clothes. With Korry's still ablaze in summer shades amid the fall arrivals, an extensive palette ensures you'll never be red with envy or green with embarrassment. In the summer hues, purple is prominent — the full gamut from lilac through mauve into indigo. For fall, black, gray and blue are the headliners.

Notwithstanding the foregoing rant about Casual Friday, Korry's casual wear collection continues to expand. New additions include Sand from Sweden, an exquisite wash & wear shirt line in a rainbow of bold colours. In outerwear, Korry's is carrying the ruggedly stylish and toasty warm Canada Goose line for fall/winter. And, from the U.S., Paige Premium Denim (yes, jeans — for the right time, and place).

But on this day, the conversation comes full circle, back to the suit. "They say there's no keeping a good product down," says Saul. "But there's also no keeping a good look down. Suit and tie, jacket and tie is a great look. Twenties, 30s, 40s, pick any decade you want, any century — the suit is king. Always has been, always will be."

A video of an old Harbord graduating class has Saul waxing nostalgic. "You see how distinguished those kids looked?" he muses. "Suit and tie, jacket and tie. They're 18 and they look 30. Slowly but surely, we're getting back to that."

Full circle. What's old is new again. With a difference: there's infinitely more variety now, in fabrics, styles and patterns, and more freedom to mix and match. The possibilities are endless — making all the more valuable a store that can help you run the gauntlet of choices and pick what's right for you. A store that won't let you leave looking like less than a million bucks.

"If you look like 900 thousand, we've failed," chirps Saul. "The statement you make is important to us. We're not going to rubber-stamp anything that just looks OK."

Nor will they leave any stone unturned in conveying their message. Between them, Saul and son Michael extol the virtues of Korry's on five radio stations. Too much Korman content? Their detractors think so. "We won't hold it against them," shrugs Saul. "We'll still sell them a suit."

You'll be hard-pressed to find detractors on the Danforth, whose many shops and restaurants are grateful to Saul for talking up the street on his airtime dime. "What's not to like?" he queries. "A hundred good restaurants and cafés. Great neighbours. The Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth, doing so much good for charity. I'm just a kid from Rouyn-Noranda who landed on the Danforth — what did I know? It's almost like G_d handpicked the perfect street for me."

If you're looking to handpick a new suit, the Hugo Boss, Canali, Pal Zileri and Coppley collections anchor Korry's high end, while its own Roberto label dominates the midrange. But don't think that taking advantage of the Roberto two for one means settling for second best. "'Proudly made in Canada and Italy still means something," says Shawn. "That's what you get when you buy Roberto." Its quality, he notes, rivals that of imports costing double the price. "We don't sell a low-grade garment," he says. "It's not in our DNA."

Many wedding parties take advantage of the Roberto label's unbeatable quality-to-price ratio. It's an opportunity to invest in a permanent addition to one's wardrobe rather than shelling out for a tux that's here today, gone tomorrow.

In keeping with the old-is-new theme, French cuffs and cufflinks are back in a big way, adding elegance and flair to any suit.

Korry's contributions to the sartorial splendour of Toronto men are mirrored by its contributions to the community. Its annual golf tournament — hosted again this year by the Scarboro Golf and Country Club — raises significant funds for the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation, on whose board Saul serves. And his promotional efforts on behalf of the annual Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth, which to date has raised over $1,000,000 for the Toronto East General — are tireless. This, too, is part of the legacy Shawn is inheriting.

With constant reminders of Korry's location emanating from your favourite radio station, it's certainly not hard to find. But, like your mother's nagging you to wear a sweater, the reminders just keep on coming. "Where? In the heart of GreekTown. At five six nine Danforth Avenue. And it's called.... Korry's."

Music to a fashion maven's ears.

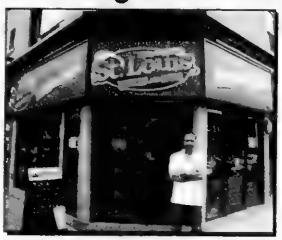
GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Sun shines in on wing & rib lovers at St. Louis



561 Danforth Ave. • 647-351-1112

For the occasional wing or rib eater, there are many Toronto restaurants to choose from.

For the wing or rib lover, there are only a handful that rate.

For the wing or rib fanatic, however — the person for whom a night out without wings or ribs is an impossibility — only one restaurant measures up.

The name St. Louis Bar and Grill has long been synonymous with the GTA's best wings and ribs. Yes, they have great sandwiches. Yes, they have wonderful salads. And yes, they have the juiciest burgers and crispest fries this side of heaven.

But it's their wings and ribs that make their fans drive clear across town to satisfy their craving. So powerful is the pull of this iconic destination that wing and rib fanatics set their GPS devices by it.

Reza Yazdani, confirmed wing fanatic and owner of the newest and brightest St. Louis at 561 Danforth Avenue, says the St. Louis philosophy of maximum value for your dining dollar makes it a natural for GreekTown.

"I wanted an affordably-priced family restaurant in a bright, spacious, corner location. When I found this place, I saw the light."

That's no mere figure of speech. This inviting spot (northeast corner of Danforth and Carlaw, three doors from Korry's) lets the sun shine in like few other restaurants. Four articulated garage-style doors, always rolled up in good weather, comprise the entire west face. The restaurant becomes a giant patio, open yet private, with a sweeping view of the street. You're in a sunny disposition even before the food arrives.

St. Louis has 16 (count 'em) flavours of wings.

Sixteen???! Is this a restaurant or a permanent Sweet 16 wingathon?

If you want to feed your hungry family without taking out a second mortgage, you've come to the right place. Their combos are over the top, especially the "Best Of Both Worlds", a mountain of Olympic proportions: five pounds of St. Louis signature wings with wing sauce and garlic dill sauce; two racks of side ribs; a platter of golden fries; coleslaw; and two 2L bottles of pop. At $99, it serves 8 to 10 ravenous people...or the entire Toronto Argonauts football team?

For many, wings and ribs without beer is like a beach without water. Once again, St. Louis is here to help with the lowest beverages prices on the Danforth. And though it's not a sports bar, it's a great place to take in a game, with ten big screens. Unless there's a major sporting event, however, they're kept on low volume.

Even though they're fully licensed, St. Louis is a family restaurant first and foremost, and extremely child-friendly, with kids' giveaways often on the menu.

As with their regular menu (and hearty daily lunch specials as low as $6.99), the St. Louis philosophy of family value reigns supreme, says Yazdani.

A Montreal native transplanted to Toronto, he and younger brother Mack come "from a melting pot in which we not only respected and befriended other cultures and ethnicities, but enjoyed their food as well. Our mother was, and is, an amazingly versatile cook who was always open to different styles of cuisine. We love this neighborhood because it mirrors our childhood environment."

So we posed this question: If you had to choose between your mother's home cooking and a heaping plate of St. Louis wings, which would you choose?

"You think that's a hard question, but it's an easy one. I take our Family Deal to go and mix and match with whatever Mom is cooking. We do it all the time. Mom loves our wings!"

What's good enough for Mom is good enough for the St. Louis customer. At 561 Danforth Avenue, the sun shines in on wing and rib lovers and their families.

Lashar: the little carpet store that could

They say good things come in small packages; you just don't expect one of those packages to be a carpet store. Insofar as Persian and Oriental rugs are concerned, giant showrooms with a dizzying selection are the norm.

By taking the opposite approach, Lashar — formerly one block west of Pape, now one block east — has proven that, when it comes to choosing a Persian or Oriental rug, sometimes less is more. "We don't have room for thousands of pieces," grins owner Hossein Rafat, "so we have to make every piece count."

Thanks to a trained eye for quality and exquisite taste, Hossein has demonstrated the merit of having a few hundred wonderful pieces as opposed to thousands of average ones. A native of Iran who moved to Canada in the late 1970s, Hossein honed his skills for many years in the carpet trade before opening his own shop, Silk Road Imports on Eglinton. He credits old masters of the trade for helping him develop not only his skills at assessing the authenticity and value of each piece based on origin, content, and workmanship, but also an eye for visual impact. Included among those mentors are a group of Iranian Jewish mentors from New York, of whom he speaks in reverent tones.

"We're talking about a handful of people with such knowledge and sense of aesthetics that I often purchase large quantities of rugs from them sight unseen. Those rugs are always my best sellers."

From an artistic standpoint, Hossein enjoys the satisfaction of helping a client find a carpet that ties together all of the pieces in a room. "It's the single most important element in your décor-, and it's a hardwood floor's best friend," he says.

Obviously price factors into the equation as well. Forget the massively-hyped rug liquidation sales we're forever bombarded with. You can walk into Lashar any day of the week and get an eye-poppingly low price on a Persian rug of exceptional quality in almost any size. And you'll get it with the kind of warm, friendly personal service that seems to be an intrinsic part of the Danforth experience.

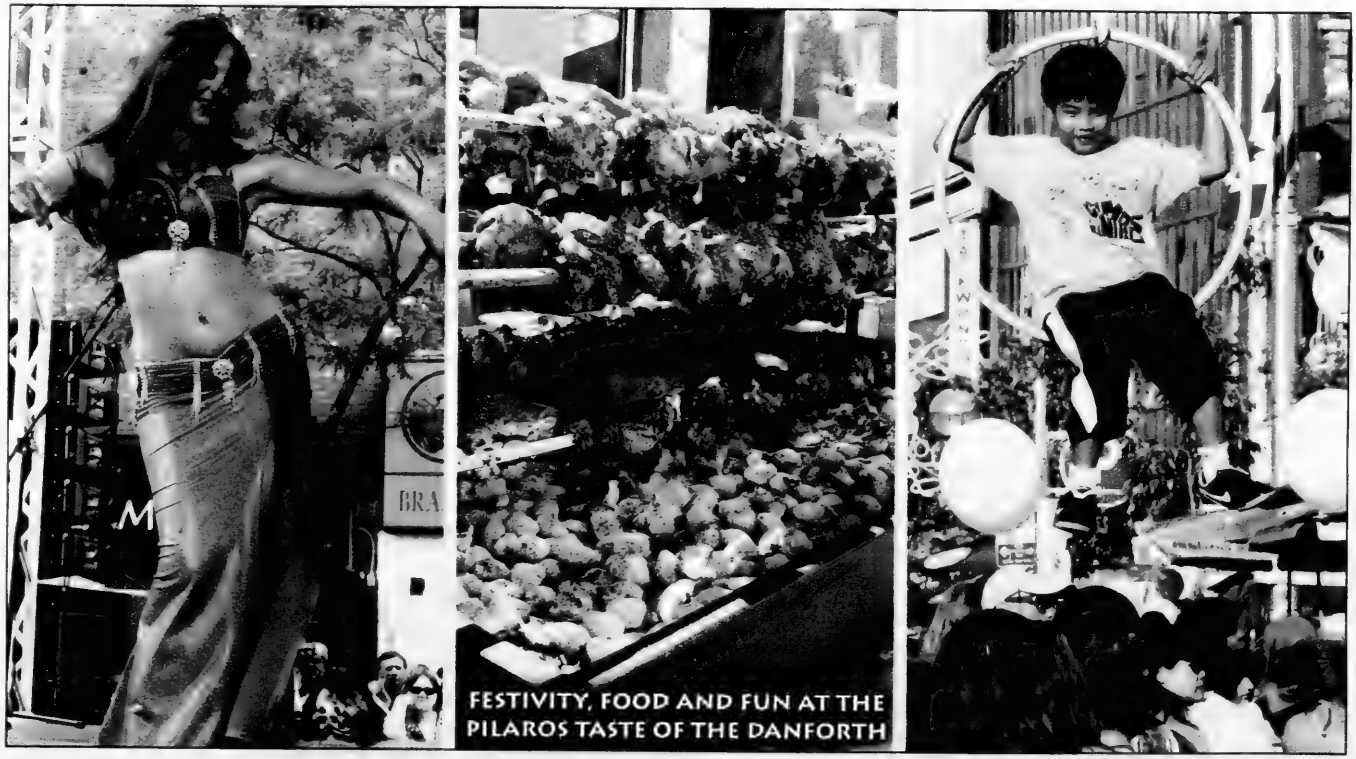
It's that conviviality, says Hossein, that attracted him to GreekTown in the first place. "In terms of a cosmopolitan atmosphere, it doesn't get any better," he says. "Besides, I love great food and great coffee. If I sell enough carpets to cover my coffee bills, I'm happy," he laughs.

In the three years he's been on the Danforth, Hossein has endeared himself to a growing clientele almost as much by his good nature as by his knowledge of carpets.

You can take all your previous conceptions of Persian carpet shopping and sweep them under the rug. Lashar on the Danforth will take you on a magic carpet ride that will beautify your home forever.



Toronto East General Hospital: leaders in community care

Leadership isn't just a role played by the Toronto East General Hospital; it's an integral part of their identity.

For years TEGH has demonstrated both leadership and innovation. The Hospital has a proud history of providing superb clinical care while never forgetting the human side of health care. Over the last three years alone, TEGH has been awarded numerous prestigious awards, established Centres of Excellence, demonstrated best practices in patient and staff safety, increased patient satisfaction scores beyond any other hospital, and has been identified by the Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care as an example of superb fiscal management.

"For hundreds of thousands of families, TEGH is the Primary Gateway to the Health Care System"
TEGH CEO Rob Devitt

A Community Hospital and More. As leaders in Community Care, TEGH serves a number of vulnerable communities, including new immigrants, single seniors, people with mental health illness and economically disadvantaged individuals, with 25% of the population classified as low income. New immigrants comprise 44% of the population in TEGH's catchment area.

New programs and initiatives. Time and again, TEGH has demonstrated its leadership in medical programs through initiatives such as its Thoracic Regional Centre of Excellence, Family Practice outreach to marginalized patients, its ground-breaking and nationally respected Prolonged-Ventilation Weaning Centre, and its sought-after medical resident education program.

TEGH's $210 million dollar Capital Redevelopment Campaign includes a new, state-of-the-art Patient Care Centre that will establish TEGH as the destination for health care excellence

The vital role of a community hospital. As health care becomes more specialized, the role of a community hospital is becoming more crucial. Community hospitals provide a strong medical and social support system for more than 90% of our society's health care needs. Community hospitals will be required to provide the lion's share of health care services, with academic research hospitals dealing with highly specialized care.

Says Teresa Vasilopoulos, President of the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation: "We are grateful to be a part of the Pilaros Taste of the Danforth and are thrilled with the generous support we receive from the many restaurants and businesses on the Danforth each year through this event. Funds raised this year will be supporting TEGH's $210 million Capital Redevelopment Campaign that will include a new Patient Care Centre. This new, state-of-the-art facility will improve access and infection control and establish TEGH as the Destination for Health Care Excellence for east Toronto and beyond."

"The generous support...will help establish TEGH as the Destination for Health Care Excellence"
TEGH Foundation President Teresa Vasilopoulos

It all starts with community support and involvement. Nowhere is this better exemplified than at the Pilaros Taste of The Danforth. There's no greater reward than knowing that your dining and entertainment dollars are directly responsible for saving lives. The new TEGH Patient Care Centre will be tangible evidence of your contributions.

The management and staff of TEGH look forward to seeing you at the Taste.

Help.

Toronto East General Hospital thanks the Pilaros Taste of the Danforth organizers and the many restaurants and businesses along the Danforth who support TEGH, at this event and throughout the year.

We enjoy and are grateful for this tremendous community partnership.

To date over $1M has been donated to TEGH through the Taste of the Danforth.
Congratulations to all!

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Historical flavours come alive at Messini

When visiting most websites, you're tempted to "Skip Intro" as prompted. You want to get to the heart of the matter ASAP.

Visit Messini's website, however, and you'll find yourself engrossed in the historical introduction; at Messini, history is at the heart of the matter.

A sequence of richly-textured, sepia-toned photographs of the southern Greek village of Messini, circa 1930, set the historical stage for the taste treat you'll experience at 445 Danforth.

After 23 years of restauranteuring in Europe, owner Marinos Dafnas opened Messini with the singular goal of elevating gyros preparation to the lofty level it enjoys in Greece. If you know gyros only as meat on a pita, Messini will open your eyes — and your taste buds — to an exciting new dining experience.

So how does the Messini version of gyros rise above the rest?

- Meticulous preparation. Roasted to perfection on a spit, the gyros (pronounced yee'-ros, from Modern Greek guros, "turning") combines the finest marinated cuts of moist and dry meat to ensure that it retains its juiciness and tenderness throughout the cooking process. Unlike your typical fast-food gyros, Messini's are prepared fresh from scratch: no freezing, no precooking;
- Quality and freshness of trimmings. The tzatziki, red onions, parsely, spices, and French fries (as per Greek tradition), like the meat, are all up-to-the-minute fresh;
- Pita made fresh daily on the premises. As with any fresh homemade bread vs. mass-produced, there's simply no comparison.
- Variety. Messini caters to a wide range of palates and dietary preferences by offering chicken and vegetarian gyros in addition to the traditional meat.

The result: a whole that's greater than the sum of its parts — a sandwich that melts in your mouth with a rich blend of subtly interwoven flavours.

The prices are more than reasonable, with gyros dinner entrées starting from $9.25, lunch specials from $6.50. The menu also includes mainstream Greek selections, but you'll do yourself a disservice if you don't at least try the gyros.

Messini's immaculate interior flanks an open kitchen. Pleasant brown and cream tones — gleaming ceramic tile floor, rich wood trim and comfortable seating — create an aura of casual dining elegance.

The beaches of Peloponessos may seem far away, but at Messini, some of southern Greece's best tradition and culture is right here for the sampling.

Even Leaf fans wing it to Detroit Eatery

If you're a Leaf fan and the best burger in town is served at a Red Wing hangout, do you eat there?

Leaf fans — and fans of old-fashioned home cooking in general — have spoken. The answer is a resounding YES.

The incredible homemade burgers served up at Detroit Eatery have become the stuff of legend. The big chains should send their head honchos here to learn what a real burger tastes like.

These bountiful burgers would be much harder for a Leaf fan to appreciate if the proprietors were the rub-it-in type. But they're not.

On the contrary, Alex Antaras and his son Chris are endearingly humble and easy-going. When he's not serving, Alex can often be seen on the bench in front of the restaurant, holding court with customers, friends, and neighbours. His friendly banter is as much a part of the Detroit experience as wife Eva's delectable offerings that emerge, piping hot, from Detroit's busy kitchen.

If you're strictly old-school as far as your burgers are concerned, Detroit's your destination. The patties are individually hand-made from the finest lean ground beef; no freezing, no pre-forming, no fillers.

The Antarases inherited the name Detroit when they bought the business in 1987. Chris, 18 and still involved in hockey at the time, took it upon himself to festoon the walls with Red Wing memorabilia. The rest is history.

And what history! Members of the Detroit Red Wings not only visit (Kris Draper's a regular), they also bring the Cup with them when they win it — which is often. Will the Leafs do likewise, if/when? Good thing the Antarases are in it for the long haul.

DETROIT EATERY

389 DANFORTH AVENUE
ACROSS FROM CHESTER SUBWAY
416-461-0136 • Open 8 to 9 daily

But hockey players aren't the only celebrities who do Detroit. On a given day you might see Jim Cuddy, Rick Mercer, Steve Paige, Gord Downey — or anyone who knows good home cooking when they taste it.

Detroit jumpstarts your day with a championship-worthy breakfast special that rivals the burgers in popularity. It's available all day long. Gargantuan sandwiches (steak, corn beef, roast beef and club) and steaming homemade soups hit the spot like a Gordie Howe slapshot. Old-school.

Open 8 am to 9 pm seven days a week and licensed, Detroit tames even the most ravenous appetites in an ambience so relaxed it's easy to forget you're in a restaurant.

There's not much more you can ask of an eatery.

Well, maybe one thing.

The next time Draper brings the Cup 'round for a visit, would you mind asking him if we can keep it for a year? We haven't seen it in ages.

After 38 years, Greek bouzouki band still rocks the house

Somebody forgot to tell Galaxy Orchestra that after 38 years it's time to coast into the sunset.

How does this venerable bouzouki band keep "bringing it" like a bunch of teenagers auditioning for their first gig?

"I guess either nobody has told us to stop playing, or if they did, we haven't been listening," chuckles band founder and bouzoukist extraordinaire Ken Kakoullis.

Over the past 50 years, the traditional Greek folk music played by Galaxy and other bouzouki bands has slowly but surely made inroads into contemporary western folk music.

In part, bouzouki's growing popularity on this side of the pond stems from a unique sound that in a western-world musical context is neither folk nor rock. It occupiers an electrifying middle ground between the two genres. It's folk, but more than folk — the high-pitched exuberance of the bouzouki takes the tempo and the volume up a notch. It's rock, but never hard — the bouzouki doesn't jar the senses like an electric guitar on steroids.

There is, says Kakoullis, no other instrument that sounds quite like it, or evokes the same deep-seated feelings. It is that uniqueness — first experienced as an 11-year-old in his native Cyprus — that grabbed him and never let go.

"I heard a few minutes of it on the radio. I didn't know what it was, and when I asked my father about it, he discouraged me. He didn't like the idea of me doing the nightclub scene."

Six years later, having moved to Canada with his family, Kakoullis again heard the sweet sounds of the bouzouki calling his name. This time, he was not to be dissuaded.

The want ad read Bouzouki for sale, $100. "It was in terrible condition, but I had to have it," says Kakoullis. Only one problem: neither he nor his family could afford it. His father finally relented on condition that Ken save up enough to pay for it himself. In so doing, his father knew full well that with his budding bouzoukist remitting all of his earnings directly to the family piggy bank to help pay the bills, this purchase would be an impossibility. Confident that this wanton impulse would soon vanish into the ether, he greenlighted the purchase.

But where Kakoullis had a will, he found a way. After extracting a promise from the vendor to put it on layaway ("nobody else would have been dumb enough to buy it anyway"), he managed to siphon off $5 a month from his $25 earnings and give the family the remaining $20 as "full disclosure."

The rest, as they say, is history.

After two years of playing by ear and shadowing established bouzouki players, Kakoullis formed Galaxy Orchestra with a group of fellow musicians who, like him, were looking to make their way in the music world.

"Our first gig was a high school dance. We were just hoping to get through it without being pelted by rotten tomatoes," he laughs.

The audience didn't throw tomatoes, they threw roses. A band was born.

From that day forward, the phone rang off the hook. Galaxy Orchestra rapidly became a household name in the Greek community. If you had a dance, a wedding, or any special event that required live entertainment, Galaxy was your go-to band. Slowly but surely, their unique sound began to catch on with other ethnicities and in the general community.

A band is born: Ken Kakoullis (left) and two other members of the original Galaxy Orchestra in 1973

The years that followed saw numerous changes in personnel. Never losing sight of the teamwork that was required to stay tight both on and off the stage, Kakoullis was quick to jettison any band member who marched to his own drummer. Laying down the law was never easy, he says, but in hindsight it's the "family first" approach that has allowed the band to remain together as a going concern for almost four decades, with no sign of slowing down.

"I had my ego like any kid, he says, "but somehow I always knew that the music took priority over individual agendas. The music is the star — not us."

His ability to come to this conclusion at an early age is due in large part to the history and traditions of Greek folk music, he says. "Most of these old songs require a very specific interpretation," he says. "So there is less temptation to go off on a tangent. The best way to put your own personal stamp on them is to play with all your heart and soul, while remaining faithful to the original."

Some aspiring musicians might view that as self-limiting, but if so then they're listening to their ego, says Kakoullis.

"The bouzouki is a very pure instrument, and it's that purity of sound that first captivated me," he says. "That sound still thrills my soul, it sends chills up and down my spine even today. I always saw my job as being a conduit for that sound, to carry it to the ears of the audience. That is the beauty of bouzouki. You do not need to embellish. You let the music flow through you."

Over time, enough like-minded musicians got with the Galaxy program to form its current core group of seven. All have families or full time day jobs or both. Opportunities to go on tour have been resisted. "There's no wouldacoulda-shoulda", says Kakoullis. We're regular guys and a gal who love to make music." In that vein, Galaxy has never stopped accepting engagements to play weddings and any other special events for which their services are requested. "A lot of successful bands refuse these private engagements because they feel it's beneath them," says Kakoullis. "Each to his own, but what does that mean? Does that mean that if your music makes people happy it is beneath you to acknowledge that and honour it? We never thought so, and I hope we never will."

Despite his modesty, Galaxy's sterling reputation is a matter of record. They've played the Taste Of The Danforth every year since its inception, save last year when multiple concurrent commitments prevented them from participating. Says Dino Carambelas, longtime Artistic Director of the Taste, "in terms of Greek bouzouki bands, Galaxy's as good as they come. They are a pleasure to work with, and they play every set like there's no tomorrow."

For Kakoullis, one of the most gratifying aspects of his storied career is that for up and coming bouzouki players, there will indeed be a tomorrow thanks to his role in growing the genre. He not only gives private lessons, he has also developed a bouzouki teaching method that is in use worldwide, and maintains a workshop where he builds bouzoukis by hand.

"The bouzouki is more than a musical instrument", he rhapsodizes. "It's a living thing. It is culture — Greek culture — and it is history. My bouzouki and I are joined at the hip. I am very proud that bouzouki playing is now more popular in Canada than when I arrived, and I would like to think that in some small way I have contributed to that upcurve. When I finally lay down my bouzouki forever, I will do so in the knowledge that there are many, many talented young players to carry on the tradition."

For Kakoullis, the reverence for this ancient instrument and the music it creates clearly supersedes all other considerations. For any youngsters forming a band — not just a bouzouki band, but any band — he has this advice. "Nobody is bigger than the music, and there is no "I" in team. The band that plays together, stays together."

Galaxy's cohesion illustrates the benefits of a one-for-all approach, he says. "The whole is greater than the sum of its parts. We have a sound, and every member makes an integral contribution to that sound."

With close to four decades under its belt, Galaxy continues to thrill audiences at the Taste Of The Danforth and many other events and venues. They are regular guys and a gal, but after listening to their celestial sounds for a minute or an hour, you cannot help but feel that the Muse Terpsikhore has descended from heaven to touch them with her golden hand.

And, with gilded ears, stayed to listen.

The bouzouki in brief: history and construction

The name "tambouras" has been used by the Greeks since the fourth century B.C. to describe a series of stringed musical instruments resembling the "bouzouki", regardless of size, number of strings, fret distribution and positioning or tuning.

This series of instruments belonged to the Tamboura family based on the following similarities:

- A small, usually pear-shaped sound box;
- A long, thin, straight neck;
- Frets that were originally adjustable, but are now customarily fittred permanently on the fret board;

- Pegs (Klidia) that were originally made of hardwood (ebony) and fitted similarly to those of the violin family have now been replaced by commercially made machine heads;
- Six strings supported by a bridge (kavalaris) and plucked with a plectum (penna) or with the fingernails. In recent years, eight-string bouzoukis have gradually supplanted the six-string version.

The bouzouki is widely considered to be the forerunner of the lute family of instruments.

World's flavours and aromas congregate at Tsaa

Would you travel around the world for a cup of tea? Luellie and Jonathan Ramos did.

Riding the crest of the tea renaissance that is sweeping North America, the siblings opened Tsaa (pronounced "chah", Filipino for tea) with a view to sharing their passion for the aromatic beverage produced from these ancient leaves.

Most of the actual travelling is done by a globetrotting tea buyer who goes direct to the farms in China, East India, Japan, and other countries where tea is cultivated. The research Luellie and Jonathan conducted before opening their shop, however, took them on a virtual journey to many parts of the planet. Convinced they could communicate their passion to others, they opened Tsaa one year ago in the heart of GreekTown with the blessing and full participation of their father Eligio and mother Luz.

Cool birch and oak tones, off-white walls and a cantilevered ceiling set the mood for a slow, soothing, sensory experience.

For the unsophisticated among us to whom a cup of tea always meant a cup of orange pekoe, the variety of new choices is eye-opening. To the tea connoisseur, our frame of reference is as limiting as defining a bouquet of wild flowers by a single petal.

How to entice and educate us? "Exposure to stimuli," says Jonathan. "We simply open the drawers of a treasure chest of hundreds of flavors that have existed for thousands of years. To those who are experiencing them for the first time, it is a revelation."

Your first visit to Tsaa may indeed result in a "tea epiphany". Having one of their hundred-odd containers of tea opened for an aroma sampling is an olfactory indulgence, and a wonderful prequel to tasting it.

To what do we owe the western world's sudden reawakening to a drink that for 5,000 years has been second only to water in worldwide consumption? The Ramos siblings attribute it to what Marshall McLuhan termed the "global village". Thanks to the internet, previously unseen far-off riches are now in plain sight. The child in us wants to reach out, touch them, taste them.

With tea, how is our curiosity rewarded?

With the realization that there's more to hot beverages than we ever dreamed.

With the gratification of a hundred new flavours and aromas to experience, in both pure and blended teas.

With new, caffeine-free options for hot days. Tsaa's Cranberry Autumn Lemonade blends black tea with orange peel, cloves, cranberry pieces and vanilla beans for a refreshing thirst-quencher with no sugary aftertaste. Their Apple Sencha is a crisp infusion of apple pieces, green tea and vanilla beans, sweetened to your taste with sugar, agave syrup or coconut palm nectar. These are but two of dozens of cooling options, served in exquisitely decadent towering flute glasses.

If the blended teas cool and refresh, however, it's the pure teas that delineate the flavor spectrum. Along with subtle differences in taste and aroma, the oxidation level increases as the colour darkens. From unoxidized white tea through yellow, green, oolong, black, and fully oxidized post-fermented tea, each step along the way opens up new vistas to your taste buds.

Though Luellie is a certified tea somellier, she says her education is by no means complete. "You could spend a lifetime studying tea and still have more to learn," she says. She looks forward to broadening her education by travelling the world to see with her own eyes and touch with her own hands the fruits of the tea harvest. Having already steeped herself in the history and culture of this ancient libation, she wants to go direct to the source.

For a full command of tea, as for languages, immersion is obviously de rigueur. For us neophytes merely wishing to enjoy, Tsaa is the perfect place to start.

Thuna's Sleeper a 123-year overnight success

It's a delightful anachronism-reminiscent of an old English apothecary shop. Fifteen hundred glass jars, each filled with a different herb or root, stacked high in orderly rows. The original creaking hardwood floor. A proprietor and manager who are all about knowledge and caring.

Established in 1888 (how's that for history?), Thuna Herbals is now run by Evelyn Dorfman, the granddaughter of founder Dr. Max Harriman Thuna, and herbalist Roger Lewis on the original turn-of-the-century premises at 298 Danforth Avenue.

Over the years, the Thuna family has seen the use of herbal remedies — once the de facto method of treatment for most medical problems — lose ground to the synthetic drugs that have flooded the marketplace.

More recently, however, the pendulum has slowly but surely begun to swing back, as more and more people seek alternatives to mainstream medicine.

One ailment they often attempt to relieve is sleeplessness. With stress levels ratcheting up both in the workplace and at home, many of us have succumbed to "busy disease" to such an extent that we no longer know any other way. A good night's sleep has become the exception rather than the rule.

Enter The Sleeper.

This completely natural, drug-free and chemical-free sleep remedy, several years in the development and formulation, has all the makings of a breakthrough product. Having undergone the most rigorous testing procedures available, it exceeds federal government minimum efficacy requirements by a whopping 860%, safety requirements by 59%. A miracle of modern science? Quite the contrary. It's the scientific product of an ancient science.

It is poetic justice that the product should be brought to market by Lionel Pasen, in the pioneering spirit of his father Saul Pasen and his grandfather Dr. Thuna. At 298 Danforth Avenue, the old, weather-beaten sign still proudly bears his name.

Pasen developed the formula with input from Lewis in order to serve a broader market than could reasonably be accommodated in these quaint premises. "We have the machinery and equipment to produce in large quantities the remedies my father and grandfather made up in small batches," he smiles.

"The fact that it's a pleasant-tasting liquid makes it more convenient, and the fact that it bears the federal government seal of approval makes it more palatable to the general public. But we have not reinvented their wheel. We've merely given it a modern spin. Our product is their product."

Available at Thuna's and a growing number of retailers, The Sleeper has received rave reviews since hitting store shelves three months ago. Says Pasen, "Each of its main components contributes positively to sleep induction, and the synergy of these components gives you a drug-free, restful night's sleep that leaves you feeling refreshed, with no after-effects or sluggishness."

Thuna's is a Toronto landmark that ties a storied past to a promising future. Yes, the Sleeper is an exciting new product. But it's rooted in the rich traditions of an immigrant Jewish herbalist whose ancient practise remains as relevant today as it was 123 years ago.

The Sleeper has its roots in the pioneering efforts of Dr. Max Harriman Thuna (top) and son Saul Pasen (middle).

Lure of Danforth follows Roger Stefan-Wils from Café Brussel to Saucier Foods

Roger Stefan-Wils is living proof that you can take the chef out of the Danforth, but you can't take the Danforth out of the chef.

As founder and head chef of the venerable Café Brussel for 22 years, Wils developed an affinity for the Danforth neighborhood in which he worked and the clientele who came from all over Toronto and beyond to enjoy Brussel's inimitable cuisine.

Old-world approach: no shortcuts, no compromises

A decision to segue into food manufacturing was like leaving an old friend: "The hardest part was knowing I'd be interrupting relationships with customers who had become family."

A funny thing happened on the way to the factory, however. Though he moved his stock pot to an industrial location in Scarborough, he never really left the Danforth. Weekly participation in the Withrow Park Farmer's Market kept him umbilically connected to the neighbourhood, old customers and friends.

Going off like the novelist and emerging from seclusion with the world's next great chef-d'oeuvres worked in theory, but "I missed the human contact", he says. "I can't create in a vacuum."

The son of a Belgian chocolate-maker, Wils was weaned on an old-world, old-school approach: no shortcuts, no compromises. All his sauces are free of gluten, fillers, powders, MSG and preservatives. Many of his products are organic, and all of the meat and poultry used is hormone-free and antibiotic-free.

In addition to sauces, stocks and tortières, Saucier's product line includes soups, quiches, galettes, and patés.

At $7 and change, a small Saucier tortière is organic, free range, hormone-free and antibiotic-free. The taste is exquisite and the quality of the ingredients top-drawer; from a Wils kitchen you'd expect no less. But it's the sheer quantity of the key ingredients that strikes you.

Take the Steak And Mushroom pie, for example. Most conventional meat pies contain as little meat as the manufacturer can get away with while still calling it a "meat pie." Saucier's version is just the opposite. It's crammed with so many chunks of succulent, nourishing, free-range Grade AAA beef that you might as well be eating a small steak, with just enough gravy to achieve a creamy texture beneath a substantial flaky crust.

On balance, what you're getting for what you're paying is actually a bargain, but Wils doesn't want to overplay this. "Getting a pat on the back for giving people the quality they deserve in the first place doesn't sit right," he says. Though consumer acceptance of his products has triggered a major expansion to larger, state-of-the-art facility in Mississauga, he retains his ingrained boutique mentality.

"I've never really thought of myself as a manufacturer, and still don't. Of course at some point manufacturing implies volume, but nobody's sitting with a calculator figuring out how much we can charge per unit based on how little we can get away with including. That's not my deal. I got into this to produce the most nourishing, environmentally-friendly food I possibly can at a reasonable price. I'll sink or swim on that basis."

You wouldn't normally associate meat pies with a weight-control régime, but Wils' product has found favour not only with gourmets but also with athletes for whom high-performance food is a must. So much so that an Athlete's Performance Pack is currently in the works.

Wils' products are carried by better natural and specialty food stores across the GTA, like The Big Carrot (naturally), The Sweet Potato, and others. Visit saucierfoods.com for a complete list of products and vendors.

Organic, free range, hormone-free, antibiotic-free

The name "Saucier" is French for saucemaker. Traditionally subordinate to the Head Chef and Sous-Chef in the culinary pecking order, "the saucier is like the point guard in basketball. Without him, nothing happens," says Wils. He prefers to see himself as catalyst rather than captain.

And what of his legendary desserts? Any chance of them making an appearance in his product line?

"At the Farmer's Market only, for now. One good thing at a time."

If you've got a yen for fine food and savour the Danforth experience, who better to help you indulge it than the departing son who never really left?

From herbalism to rock and back again: it all started on the Danforth

You'll never have a problem finding vitamins or herbal remedies on the Danforth, with its abundance of natural health stores.

And with the Taste Of The Danforth fast approaching, odds you'll hear a guitar or two (and plenty of bouzoukis).

But what are the odds of finding one person rocking both?

Lionel Pasen today: "I loved music, but I had no connections or credentials."

The original members of J.B. and the Playboys: Drummer Doug West, lead singer Allan Nicholls, rhythm guitar Andy Kaye, lead guitar Bill Hill, bass guitar Lou Atkins

Meet Lionel Pasen, President of Natural Products Consulting Corp.

No, you won't find a guitar slung across his back. Nor will you find vitamin supplements in his briefcase (well, maybe a herbal remedy or two. But that's a story for another day).

Let's take a walk with him down memory lane, and see where the worlds of nutrition and rock intersected.

Montreal, 1963. Pasen, 26, a herbal manufacturer, is doing what comes naturally for the grandson and son of three of Canada's herbalism pioneers (grandfather Dr. Max Harriman Thuna, father Saul Pasen and mother Gertrude respectively).

A hot summer afternoon at a local country club. Pasen is chatting with fellow horseback riding enthusiast and aspiring local musician Andy Kaye (aka Andurash Kajachanei).

Andy, 18, mentions that he and four other musicians have a band, J.B. and the Playboys, that is destined for big things — if only they can find a manager to take them to the next level.

"What level are you at now?" inquires Pasen.

Bottom line? No gigs, secondhand instruments.

"I sensed he was looking for advice, but what advice could I give him?" says Pasen. "I loved music, but I had no connections or credentials."

What he did have was a big, shiny black Pontiac. "He loved that car, and perhaps my wheels impressed him enough that he thought I could be a "big wheel" in music promotion," recalls Pasen.

Whatever thought processes were involved, the connection was to be serendipitous. Would Pasen be interested in managing the band, Andy wanted to know.

Flattered that anyone — even an uknown band — would see fit to offer him a managerial position based on his zero experience in the music business, Pasen gleefully agreed to audition them.

The next day, Pasen slid behind the wheel of his newly-relevant big black Pontiac and drove to Buckthorn, Quebec to hear the group perform.

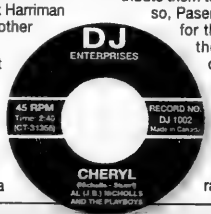
They sounded pretty good to his untrained ear. "They weren't the Beatles, but they were good enough for me to entertain the delusion that I could promote them."

Wasting no time reaching for this pie in the sky, Pasen began by cobbling together enough loose change to buy the band uniforms and better instruments.

This was huge progress. Having started with no gigs and poor instruments, the band now had the right getup, the right gear — and still no gigs.

The next step was to print up flyers and distribute them to local high schools. Having done so, Pasen crossed his fingers and waited for the phone to ring. "At that point there wasn't much more I could do except drive around to every venue, hat in hand, asking for an audition."

About two weeks later, in early November — just when making those rounds seemed a distinct possibility — the phone rang.



The conversation went something like this, according to Pasen.

CALLER: Hi there. I got your leaflet. Is your band good?

PASEN: Of course they're good. They're the best!

CALLER: We have a dance coming up November 12th.

PASEN: You mean next November 12th? We should be able to fit you in.

CALLER: No, this November 12th. Next week.

PASEN: Sorry. We're booked solid into next year.

CALLER: Oh, no! We really need a band. What is your fee?

PASEN: Five hundred dollars.

CALLER: Five hundred dollars. Are you crazy? Other bands charge $150 tops.

PASEN: I'm sorry, but we're not other bands. We're J.B. and the Playboys. We charge 500 dollars and I wish I could help you, but like I said we're booked solid.

CALLER: Look, we really need a good band. We'll pay your fee. Can't you fit us in?

PASEN: If I take your gig, I lose the other gig. Look...Give me your number and I'll call you back tomorrow. I'm not promising anything. If we can't do it, maybe I'll find you another band who can.

There was, of course, no "other band." J.B. and the Playboys had just secured their first engagement.

Fast forward many successful performances, to the spring of 1965. J.B. and the Playboys are now considered by many to be Montreal's answer to The Beatles. Recalls former Montrealer and popular musical history buff Leo Cook, now 64, "They were hot stuff. If you followed the Montreal rock scene, you knew J.B. and the Playboys."

April 23, 1965. The Rolling Stones are playing L'Aréna Maurice Richard in Montreal. And opening for the Stones is...

J.B. and the Playboys.

The band would go on to meet or work with many of the era's top bands and performers, including The Beatles, The Dave Clark Five, the Beach Boys, Herman's Hermits, and Sonny and Cher.

In 1965, they released their sole album, the self-titled J.B. and the Playboys, under the RCA label.

They were never again to reach those dizzying heights.

In May 1966, tired of being confused with Gary Lewis and the Playboys, they changed their name to the Jaybees. That moniker stuck until July 1967, when the band again reinvented itself as The Carnival Connection. It was to be their final incarnation.

During this three-year period, some of the original members left to pursue other musical or acting opportunities or interests, or were replaced for a variety of reasons. By late 1968 the group had disbanded.

Members of the original J.B. and the Playboys achieved varying degrees of success in the entertainment industry, perhaps none more than Nicholls, who went on to perform the lead role in Hair on Broadway.

And Pasen? He picked up his herbal manufacturing career where he'd left off. He went on to become one of the founders of the Canadian Health Food Association, on whose board he served for 38 years. At a spry 74, he continues to communicate the family teachings of healthy living as both a lecturer and consultant.

J.B. and the Playboys' first and only album, released in 1965 by RCA

His grandfather Dr. Max Harriman Thuna is long gone, but his legacy endures. Thuna Herbals at 298 Danforth Avenue, still owned and operated by his granddaughter Evelyn Dorfman, is the last remaining location of what was, at the turn of the century, Canada's first chain of herbal stores, ambitiously founded by Dr. Thuna.

Life after J.B. and the Playboys: Allan Nicholls would go on to play the lead in Hair on Broadway

The good doctor's vision of spreading the gospel of natural health nationwide was ultimately undone by a series of misfortunes stemming from "naiveté and excessive trust," says Pasen. "But to this day, his name is legendary. The children and grandchildren of those he served are still in awe of his desire and ability to heal."

Those words are, no doubt, sweet music to the soul of a Danforth pioneer.

Where it all began: original Thuna store, founded in 1888, still stands at 298 Danforth Avenue

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Navagio (Greek for "Shipwreck") Beach is an isolated sandy cove on Zakynthos island and one of the most famous beaches in Greece. It is notable because it is home to the wreck of the alleged smuggler ship Panagiotis; thus, it is often referred to as 'Smugglers' Cove'. At left you can see the metallic wreckage of the ship, half-buried in the sand.

Navagio is located on the north-west shore of the Ionian island of Zakynthos (Zante), in the Municipality of Elation. The area is defined by its sheer limestone cliffs, white sand beaches, and clear blue water. This strip of beach can be accessed only by boat, but you may also see it from above, standing on the high rocks that overlook it.

The half-buried ship is of recent vintage, however. In 1980 the Greek authorities, who suspected it of smuggling cigarettes and liquor, gave chase in foul weather in the open Ionian sea and ran it ashore in the cove, where it has remained ever since.

This beach one of the most photographed sites in Greece, rivalling the Acropolis of Athens and the Parthenon.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Thessaoniki, in northern Greece, is the country's second largest city and capital of Macedonia. It retained a Jewish majority for centuries and has rich Sephardic origins.

Greeks with a Taste for building something bigger than themselves

Circa 447–432 B.C., the Greeks built the Parthenon. Today, the same tradition of architectural excellence is alive and well in GreekTown, under the watchful eyes of Takis Liris, Adonis Artemakis, and their dedicated crew. The showcase of their efforts is a small, nondescript storefront at 921 Danforth Avenue.

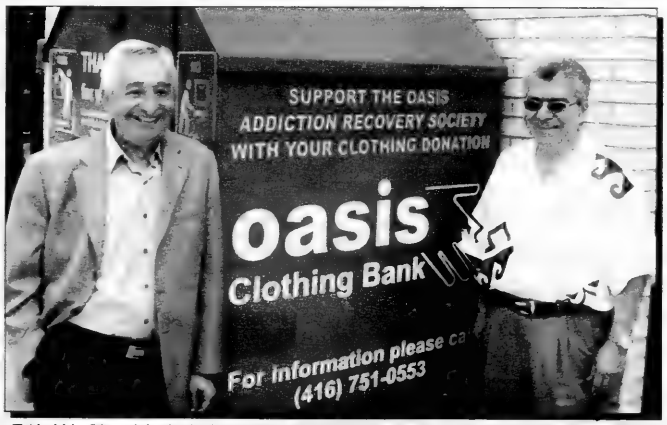
A storefront on Danforth Avenue? A showcase for architectural excellence?

No towering columns? No sculpted statues?

A different kind of architectural renaissance

If the venue seems odd, it's because this team of "architects" specializes in historical reconstruction — not of buildings, but of people. Under their direction, a team of volunteers helps those laid low by alcohol and drug addiction to rebuild their lives and self-esteem and become functioning members of society.

With financial assistance from Employment Ontario and the City of Toronto — as well as funds generated from the sale of clothing donations to the Oasis green bins throughout the GTA — the Oasis Movement acts as an umbrella organization for a myriad of programs designed to assist addicts every step of the way through the recovery process. There's an Employment Preparation Program, a Pre-Employment Personal Life Management Program, a Volunteer Program including participants from Toronto Social Services and the general public, a Job Development and Employment Placement Services Program, Casual Labour Placements, and the Oasis Employment Resource Centre.



Takis Liris (L) and Andonis Artemakis: providing a necessary Oasis for recovering addicts

Building is nothing new to Artemakis. A fireplug of a man, he has been instrumental in many important initiatives both inside and outside the Greek community. In 1993 he was involved in changing the name of the then Danforth Village to the current GreekTown On The Danforth. The following year, Artemakis and several other key players — including Stephane Abbat, Dr. Andy Syriopoulos, Sue Graham-Nuttier , and Saul Korman — spearheaded the creation of the Taste of the Danforth. The financial support of title sponsors Krinos Foods (1994–2008) and Pilaros International Trading (2009–2011) — plus the ongoing contributions of many others — has enabled the Taste to grow from a small festival with a first-year attendance of some 6,000 to what today is North America's largest street festival with an annual attendance in excess of one million.

Despite his key role in heightening the profile of Toronto's Greek community and its important contributions to the GTA's culture and economy, Artemakis sees the Danforth as "a multicultural community with a Greek character. The beauty of a cultural mosaic is that each culture or "tile" enhances the others," he says. "We have here a dynamic of mutual enrichment that all communities should be proud to be part of."

If the growth of the Taste makes him smile, the work he and Takis Liris are involved in at Oasis makes him positively light up. Says Liris, who founded the Oasis Movement in 1992, "To assist someone who is already on an upcurve is nice. But to help someone who's down pick himself up — now there's an accomplishment. We may think we know what it's like to hit rock bottom, but unless we've experienced it ourselves or seen it first-hand, we really don't know what it's like. When we can reach out to someone in that position and help him or her regain the ability to function, be gainfully employed, mend broken relationships, restore their faith — that's a success story for everybody."

The birth of an area, the Taste, a movement

Continues Artemakis, who's been involved with Oasis since 1992 in a supportive and Advisory capacity, "There's no stage here, no award presentations, no trophies. Everyone who is here is part of something bigger than themselves. People talk of "relationship building". Here, we are helping people rebuild their relationship with themself. No office tower, theatre or concert hall is a greater monument to a person's accomplishment than helping another human being get back on his feet again."

GreekTown on the Danforth: Canadian heritage in the making

Alexander The Great Parkette at Danforth and Logan: a popular spot to pause, relax, and reflect

More than a tourist area, GreekTown on the Danforth is a community. In the summer, when the trees reach their full green and Toronto's restauranteurs put out their patio tables, GreekTown puts on its Mediterranean face.

Plenty to woo your senses

Here, when friends and acquaintances greet, you are as likely to hear "Kall' imera! Ti kanis?" as "Hi! How are you?" In the restaurants and cafés, you hear patrons converse in every language of the world.

While the music of Greek polysyllables will appeal to your ears, the most important thing is not the language, but the fact that people do greet each other. Bustling and busy as the community is, everyone — not just tourists, but everyone who lives and works here — is as liable to stroll as to hurry.

There is plenty on the Danforth to woo your senses, and make you want to slow your steps: bright color and exotic decor; the sounds of the bouzouki; the aroma of lamb souvlaki wafting from a grill; and the tastes of exotic foods. It is the restaurants above all — and the atmosphere they help create, at once lively and relaxed — which draw people from all over the city and beyond.

Many restaurants capture, in their décor, the pleasing colours and terraced style associated with the Greek islands and mountainsides. And while souvlaki is everywhere on the Danforth, its dining establishments take pride in offering the full range and flavours of Greek and other Mediterranean cuisines.

But the Danforth boasts many other fine ethnic restaurants as well. To name but a few, Japanese, Italian, and East Indian cuisine are well represented. And its cafés and dessert houses are unparalleled, both in number and quality.

GreekTown is also home to Toronto's finest natural and specialty food stores and many alternative health practitioners. And it's become a leading ashion destination, with a host of fine specialty boutiques for men, women, and children, as well as European-quality beauty salons and spas.

A solid community with solid values

There is plenty of live entertainment here. At many establishments, audience participation is the rule, though after a fine, full meal, you may feel disinclined to dance on a tabletop.

There are a few other Toronto streets which are wider in actual metres, but the Danforth has an expansive feel about it which you don't find anywhere else. Majestic trees shade well-kept homes; here and there are streetside parks, where you can sit and rest your feet.

If you look closely, you see there is a solid community here. You see not only the tourists, but also the elderly and the children, as they shop, stroll or sit and chat in the cafés and parks. In the restaurants, waiters and bartenders offer everyone prompt, friendly service; there are plenty of regular guests whom they greet by name.

Nor is it just staff who do this. You will see the owners showing guests to their tables, greeting them warmly; in GreekTown, customers are family.

Also here are the institutions that belong in any healthy city neighborhood: schools, houses of worship, clubs, and community centres. People not only work here, they live here; and it is in great part because they keep GreekTown pleasant to live in, that it is pleasant to visit.

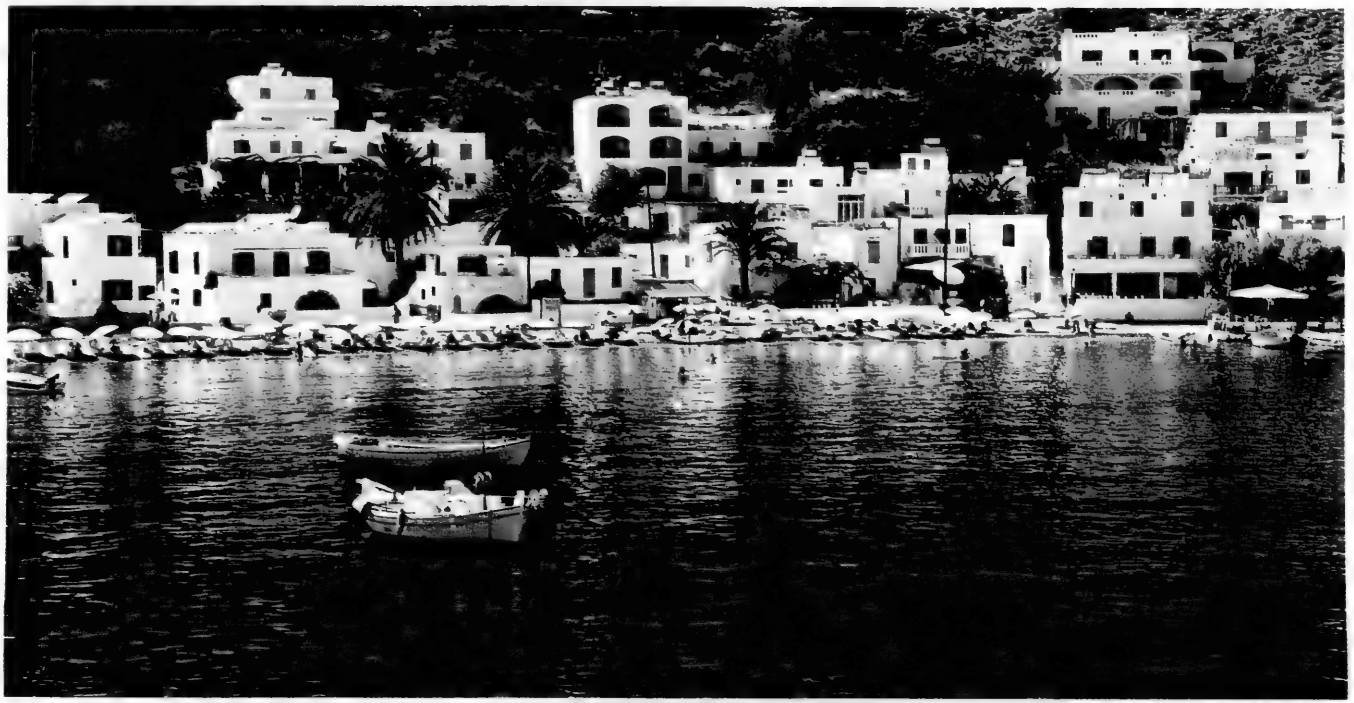
If you really want to get to know the community, chat a little with the staff members of different restaurants; you'll find that everyone knows everyone else. There is plenty of competition here, but it is friendly. To thrive, a restauranteur has to cherish the firm conviction that his or her establishment is the best; but in GreekTown, they do so without knocking the competition. If anything, the reverse is true.

It is from this wealth of restaurants that the "Taste of the Danforth" festival was born. This annual event has become so popular that GreekTown is closed to traffic for its duration. It's a great opportunity to sample the Danforth's culinary delights while enjoying its ambience, all in support of worthy charities like the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation.

While the Danforth is a community, it has never been a closed enclave. Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, an active member of the Jewish community, is also an enthusiastic promoter of GreekTown. Having been there for more than half a century — Korry's will soon celebrate its 60th anniversary — Korman knows the people of this community, many of whom started as dishwashers and short-order cooks in the '50's and '60's, then opened the first modest Greek restaurants in the '70's. Many of them came here seeking both prosperity and freedom; the late Andreas Papandreou (a recent Prime Minister of Greece) lived in Canada from 1969 to 1974.

Korman shares with the people who live and work on the Danforth their joy in the prosperity and freedom of Canada. If you come to GreekTown, you are breathing, hearing and tasting Canadian heritage — not in a museum, but as contemporary history in the making.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH



Loutro, a small, picturesque fishing village in southwestern Crete, evokes the tranquility of a simpler lifestyle. A visit to Toronto's GreekTown brings its warmth and values close to home.

Why good things happen in GreekTown

It's around this time, leading up to the Pilaros Taste of the Danforth, that some Toronto neighbourhoods not named GreekTown start exhibiting symptoms of mild discomfort. This malaise, first observed in 1994 — the year of the inaugural Taste of the Danforth — could best be termed GreekTown Envy.

If you're in business, it's only natural to admire the success of your competitors and attempt to emulate it. And make no mistake about it — neighbourhoods do compete for your shopping, dining and entertainment dollar. There are BIAs (Business Improvement Areas) all over Toronto racking their brains at this very moment in an attempt to attract you to their neighbourhood and secure your patronage.

From the Taste to My Big Fat Greek Wedding*, GreekTown's good mojo casts a welcoming net*

The resounding annual success of the Taste — Canada's largest street festival — speaks to GreekTown's penchant for making good things happen. It took a few big thinkers to get the ball rolling back in 1994, and it's taken plenty of sponsorship and grassroots support since then to sustain the momentum. Without the collective will of everyone involved, even the biggest of ideas goes nowhere.

Most other neighbourhoods give GreekTown its due. Those that don't — the GreekTown wannabees — will tell you that the Taste Of The Danforth could have happened anywhere.

That's not the point. The point is, it happened in GreekTown. It happened in GreekTown not only because of the energetic forward thinkers who conceived it, but also because of the fertile soil in which they planted their seed. It happened in GreekTown because the welcoming spirit of the restaurants and shops from Broadview to Jones is precisely the kind of environment that allows such an undertaking to flourish.

Street festivals are a source of food, fun, and family entertainment. When you can parlay all that into significant financial support for a community hospital (Toronto East General), you're accomplishing something special.

So, it's no accident that the Taste of the Danforth originated here. Nor is it surprising that the exuberant 2002 hit movie My Big Fat Greek Wedding chose to shoot some scenes here. The festive spirit of a community capable of lavishing affection on its guests — and laughing at itself — attracts positive energy. The area's increasing ethnocultural diversity and cosmopolitan flavour merely enhance its appeal.

It's a big world we live in. Whether you're five or 55, if you dropped everything right now and spent the rest of your days travelling this planet, you'd barely begin to cover it. Even if you confined your travels to a much smaller area — like Greece — you would experience a small part, at best, of its wonders.

You can't know the entire planet, but a visit to GreekTown will get you off to a running start.

In this thouliamou, they don't count the hours

Thouliamou. Parnosse. Livelihood. It's what most of us are lucky to have. And what most of us still complain about in our weaker moments.

The most common complaint is long hours. For many of us, 12- or 15-hour days mean overtime. For the average GreekTown restauranteur, they're standard time.

For most of us, one a.m. and unable to sleep means it's time to take a sedative. For the GreekTown restauranteur, it means it's time to serve another customer.

Long hours? Long days? These people eat long days for breakfast.

In fact, some of their days are so long, they finish up just in time to see their children eat breakfast.

Passing the torch is a metaphor frequently used in GreekTown. Mom and Dad or Dad and Uncle start a business, build it up, and pass the torch to their children. Here, the metaphor's doubly apt because with the hours some restauranteurs keep, that torch could well be a flashlight.

Time was, it was almost automatic for children to take up that torch. Today, less so. Times have changed. Children can now count their options because Mom and Dad didn't count their hours.

Good thing they didn't. How could they? In this business, serving food is just the tip of the iceberg. In order to be able to serve it, you have to first take inventory, buy supplies, bring them to the restaurant, and prepare them. As well as do a few other things like cleaning, washing, maintenance, linens, laundry, cutlery, payroll, hiring, paying bill after bill after bill — a triplication of your bills at home — the list goes on.

Unless you're so successful you can afford hired help for everything, you won't get it all done in eight hours. You might not get it done in ten hours. But in 12 or 15 hours, slowly slowly, you get it all done. Or enough of it to enjoy the few hours of sleep that remain — far more than the eight hours you wouldn't enjoy if you left all those loose ends hanging.

Times change, but values don't. Of the restaurants featured in this section, the vast majority are family businesses. Some have been passed on from parents to children, but in many of them, the parents are still active.

The inability to count can be habit-forming; many of these people don't count the years, let alone hours. Why should they? Why pass the torch when you're having so much fun carrying it yourself?

The children who do take up that torch — because the restaurant business is locked into their DNA — inherit not only a lifestyle but a lesson.

They learn that in this thouliamou, time is a relative concept. It's easier to work the hours than to count them. And it's relatively easier to work them with a relative or two working alongside you.

They learn that the 12- or 15-hour days that Mom and Dad worked — those long hours that might have deprived them of their favourite audience for a hockey game or soccer game or dance class — weren't really too many hours all. Turns out they were just the right number of hours needed to put bread on the table.

They learn that even though it's impossible not to feel enslaved by the business occasionally, it's more often liberating to discover just how much you can accomplish when you push your limits. And how much more time you had than you thought you had when less time is spent sleeping.

Most importantly, they learn that — in this thouliamou at least — long hours aren't the problem.

They're the solution.

Community helps fight African famine

IsraAID, a co-ordinating body of Israeli and Jewish non-governmental organizations in international development and relief work, is in Africa helping in the famine-stricken regions of Kenya, Somalia and Sudan. Supported by the Jewish communities of Canada through UIA Federations Canada, IsraAID volunteers are seen here providing aid such as drinking water, food and medicine to the people of South Sudan. The humanitarian agency is now also aiding refugees fleeing the drought and fighting in Somalia. Please see related stories on pages 3 and 8.

PM opposes Palestinian UN gambit

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Stephen Harper won't waver in his refusal to support any attempt by the Palestinians to unilaterally declare independence at the United Nations this fall.

"If the Palestinian Authority wants to obtain sovereignty, the way to do that is through negotiation. A unilateral declaration will ultimately be unsuccessful."

Harper made the remarks last Wednesday when he convened a "cultural media roundtable" while on a stopover in Toronto to take part in a memorial ceremony for Korean War Veterans Day.

The media event, held at a hotel near Pearson International Airport, was attended by representatives from the Jewish, Chinese, Caribbean, Greek, South Asian, Pakistani and Latino communities.

The prime minister attended a similar roundtable in August 2010.

With no set speaking notes or agenda, other than to allow the gathered media to have access to him and ask questions of importance to their readerships, Harper fielded pre-submitted questions.

Stephen Harper

The CJN was allowed two questions, both of which were sent to the prime minister's office ahead of time.

Asked whether Canada plans to speak with other UN member states prior to the anticipated Palestinian independence vote in the UN General Assembly this September, Harper told The CJN his government continues to push for a negotiated two-state solution.

Ban Iran, WJC Says

NEW YORK —The World Jewish Congress called on the International Olympic Committee to bar Iran from the 2012 Games until the country lets its athletes compete against Israelis. The complaint came after an Iranian swimmer, Mohammed Alirezaei, withdrew from a race in Shanghai last month in which an Israeli was participating. Although Alirezaei claimed he was "tired and drowsy," and denied political reasons, the WJC said, he used a similar excuse at the 2008 Olympics when he refused to compete in a race that included an Israeli. The WJC urged that Iran be banned from other international events, as well. The chair of Iran's national Olympic committee said last year Iranian athletes should boycott all meets that include Israelis, and in February he threatened to boycott the 2012 London Olympics over its logo, a stylized 2012 that Tehran claimed spelled Zion.

Gay Jews Marry

NEW YORK —Two elderly Jewish women were the first same-sex couple to marry in New York City. Phyllis Siegel, 77, and Connie Kopelov, 85, were married in Lower Manhattan on July 24. The couple, who've been together for 23 years, married exactly one month after Gov. Andrew Cuomo signed a measure enacted by the state legislature allowing gay marriage. Also July 24 in New York, Gregory Levin, 32, and Shane Serkiz, 33, of Queens, who have been engaged since 1999, were the first gay couple married in that borough. And at Gracie Mansion, the mayor's home, Mayor Mike Bloomberg officiated at a wedding for his adviser John Feinblatt to city Consumer Affairs Commissioner Jonathan Mintz.

Birthright Grant

NEW YORK — Philanthropists Sheldon and Miriam Adelson gave a $5-million matching grant to Taglit-Birthright Israel. The grant, announced July 25, aims to encourage new donors in an effort to move from large philanthropic grants to grassroots funding. Since 2007, the Adelsons have given more than $100 million to Birthright, which sends Jews aged 18 to 26 on free 10-day trips to Israel. Earlier this year, the Israeli government announced a three-year commitment of $100 million in matching funds for Birthright.

Vandal Gets Probation For Graffiti Spree

CALGARY — A man who spray-painted antisemitic slogans on three Jewish sites in Calgary was sentenced to 18 months probation.

Anti-Jewish graffiti and swastikas were painted on a Holocaust memorial and synagogues in November 2009.

Adam Singer

The man, who can't be named under Canadian law because he was a teenager at the time of the offences, was caught in Winnipeg in March 2010 and returned to Calgary. He was charged with inciting public hatred, as well as mischief to a place of religious worship motivated by hate – the first time that charge had been laid in Calgary.

He pleaded guilty to the charges and admitted he had been a member of a white supremacist group. During sentencing, he met with two Holocaust survivors who explained the impact of his crimes on them. His lawyer said the young man no longer belongs to any neo-Nazi groups.

In addition to probation, the man was ordered to complete 150 hours of community service.

Adam Singer, president of the Calgary Jewish Federation, told the Calgary Herald the sentence was fair and the judge understood the crime's seriousness.

Community responds to African famine

Compiled by CJN Staff

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and UIA Canada are bringing food and water to suffering populations in the Horn of Africa. The current relief efforts target Somalis who are crossing the border into Ethiopia and Kenya in order to escape the famine, the federation said in a press release.

Federation CJA in Montreal has also joined the famine relief efforts, president Jack Hasen announced last week.

"Funds collected through Canadian [Jewish] federations will be channeled through IsraAID [the Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid], a co-ordinating body of Israeli and Jewish non-governmental organizations active in development and relief work," Hasen said, also in a press release.

"This will provide a united Jewish response to the current crisis."

The Montreal federation said there would be no administration charges, and "100 per cent" of donations will be passed on to IsraAid.

In addition, the Canadian government has said that it will match in drought relief value the donations of individual Canadians to eligible registered Canadian charities.

IsraAID is communicating with the United Nations and government officials to determine distribution logistics and the types of food that are needed.

The United Nations has declared a state of famine in several regions of Somalia. Some analysts expect the entire Somali south to be added in two months.

Droughts, rising food prices, conflicts and other factors have left approximately 11 million people in need of assistance in Somalia and neighbouring countries, in what has been described as the worst drought and famine in decades, with crops and livestock destroyed and starvation and disease increasing. Large numbers of Somalis – approximately 2,000 a day – are fleeing to Kenya seeking food and aid.

IsraAID has also funded refugee camps in Kenya that will house approximately 40,000.

As of last week, the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto said it had provided more than $25,000 to the overall African relief effort. The federation has been a strong supporter of IsraAID, working with the non-governmental agency since 2006, raising more than $2 million in total to provide relief in areas of natural disaster including Japan, Haiti and New Orleans.

Earlier this month, the Toronto federation, in partnership with the American Jewish Committee and the government of South Sudan, sent a humanitarian aid shipment – via IsraAID – to the beleaguered newly created country. That shipment, worth some $30,000, was put together "on behalf of the Israeli and Jewish people as a goodwill gesture between both communities," the federation said in a statement. South Sudan became an independent state on July 9. Israel recognized it on July 10.

Shachar Zahavi, founding director of IsraAID, said he wants Africans to know Israel is a friend.

"It is our mission, consistent with Jewish values, to reach out to our new friends in any way we can," Zahavi said in a July 11 statement.

Spectacular, stark, soaring

From the editor's desk...

It is my abiding belief that the Stratford Shakespeare Festival in Stratford, Ont., is one of Canada's greatest "natural" resources. I mean "natural" of course in the sense of natural abilities and as a tribute to the individual skill, collective resolve and sheer hard work of the many hundreds of people – onstage and backstage – who, together, comprise the festival.

The Stratford Festival is the largest repertory company in the world. Each year, it gives us the opportunity to travel to lands far away and times long ago, to revel in exotic places and witness historic events, to meet men of distinction and marvel at women of valour.

And wherever the journey, whatever the play, the festival gives us the additional opportunity to explore the terra incognita of our inner selves. The plays entertain us, to be sure. But they also make us think hard and reflect upon the state of the world and of our lives within it. Even if we are familiar with the plays, we discover new nuggets of insight each time we see them presented in fresh light.

For example, Camelot, the famous play by Lerner and Loewe, is a stunning pageant of music and drama. Ostensibly, it tells a story, and movingly so, of a love triangle between the sage King Arthur, the beautiful Guenevere and the dashing Lancelot. But at its intellectual core is a deliberation about honour, justice and the rule of law.

Camelot, the place, is also Camelot the idea, the embodiment of the ideal society. "Once there was a fleeting wish of glory called Camelot," King Arthur laments toward the end of the play. But then recovering his emotional equilibrium, he proudly reminds the audience as well as himself of "one brief shining moment that was known as Camelot. At Camelot we quested for right, honour and justice."

It is nearly impossible to overstate the soaring quality and artistic force of the production. The key roles are impressively executed. Geraint Wyn Davies is a very sympathetic King Arthur. His performance combines a complex, effective mix of humility and vulnerability with a sense of history and purpose. "I am a king, not a man," he commandingly, if ruefully proclaims, with the aching awareness of the full implications of the statement.

Brent Carver, true to his usual mastery, is creative, moving and always comforting in the double role of Merlyn and Pellinore.

Kaylee Harwood plays Guenevere with bite and strength, earnest, saucy, determined and understanding. She has a smooth, lovely voice. Her interplay with King Arthur is loaded with chemistry. There is constant connection between them.

Camelot is a spectacular production. Gary Griffin's direction and Warren Carlyle's choreography soar, as do the feelings and emotions of the viewer at the final curtain.

The Grapes of Wrath is a stark, doleful tale of the exploitation and oppression of human beings during the harsh poverty of the Depression in the United States. Adapted for the stage by Frank Galati from the provocative novel by John Steinbeck, the play strikes constantly at our consciences and at our hearts.

The Joad family, like so many other families of their times, lose their farm and home and head west to what they dream will be prosperity and dignity in California. But their dream shatters like thin slate thrown against the pavement. The play ends, alas, without the suggestion that even some of the splintered shards eventually piece together.

Janet Wright is commanding as Ma Joad, trying valiantly but in vain to keep the family together. Evan Builung executes the role of Tom Joad, one of the sons, a man of volcanic temperament but profound empathy, deftly and with nuance. Chilina Kennedy plays Rose of Sharon Joad, the daughter, with the robust control of her emotions that the demanding role requires.

The play and the players convincingly evoke the misery of the migrants, the sorrowful lot of the unwanted and the distress of the downtrodden. Some in the audience were heard sobbing at the end of the play.

It is unfair, of course, to single out some performances when so many were praiseworthy. The Stratford Shakespeare Festival is primarily about theatre and the cornucopia of pleasures to which it always treats us. But we know that the benefit we receive is far more than "simply" excellent entertainment.

ISRAELI PARENTS STAGE 'STROLLER PROTEST'

Social policy protests widened last week in Israel as thousands of parents across the country staged a stroller march to protest the high costs of raising children in Israel. The main protest was held in Tel Aviv, but similar rallies and marches were conducted in other cities, including Rehovot, Kfar Saba, Ashdod, Haifa and Be'er Sheva. [Israel Sun photo]

Muslim prayer opponents promise further protests

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

An estimated 150 demonstrators gathered outside the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) headquarters last week to protest the accommodation of Muslim prayers in a public school, but one of the protest organizers is promising to ratchet up the demonstrations once the school year begins in September.

Ron Banerjee, director of Canadian Hindu Advocacy, said, "We'll picket in front of the school when they begin praying. Let's see how much praying they can do with our loudspeakers and hundreds of people there. We want to make it clear we don't approve of prayer and gender apartheid inside the school. If our loudness disrupts their prayers, then so be it."

Canadian Hindu Advocacy has joined with the Jewish Defense League (JDL) and the Christian Heritage Party to protest the TDSB policy of permitting Muslim students at Valley Park Middle School to leave class and gather inside the school cafeteria for Friday prayers led by a local imam. A further protest is set for next week.

Banerjee said these Hindu, Jewish and Christian groups have joined forces "to work together to fight this and to fight the Islamization of our society as a whole." He pointed to the accommodation of Muslim prayers and the "gender apartheid" in which girls sit behind the boys during prayers while menstruating girls are seated at the back of the "mosqueteria."

Responding to complaints over the use of school facilities to accommodate Muslim prayers, the TDSB released a statement saying it "takes reasonable steps to provide accommodation to members of religious groups who state that the board's operations or requirements interfere with their ability to exercise their religious beliefs and practices.

"In the case of Valley Park, the school is not teaching the 'religious practice.' Rather it is accommodating the religious and spiritual needs of the students as many other schools do around the country for a number of different faith communities. Providing this religious accommodation does not violate any Board policies since the service is not a Board or school activity," the TDSB stated.

"There have been concerns expressed that the practice of Islam separates individuals by gender. We do not have the authority to tell faith groups how to pray. The division of the sexes, which occurs during the service, is a part of the Islamic faith. Students who participate in the prayer services do so voluntarily and with parental permission and no one is obligated to participate."

The Toronto wing of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) issued a statement supporting the accommodation of Muslim prayers. "School space for prayer on a voluntary, extra-curricular basis, is included in the principle of religious accommodation which Ontario school boards are required to honour under Ministry of Education guidelines," CIJA stated. "Reasonable religious accommodation, which is enshrined in human rights legislation across the country, benefits all faith communities, including the Jewish community. The absence of reasonable religious accommodation would negatively affect Jewish students and those of other faiths. School boards should closely monitor religious accommodation activities taking place on their property and all such activities should be consistent with the values of the board."

Expanding on that position, Howard English, vice-president of the Greater Toronto region of CIJA, said reasonable religious accommodation "benefits the Jewish community tremendously. It allows for absences on religious holidays and for voluntary extra-curricular Jewish heritage programs in schools as well."

However, English added the TDSB "has the responsibility to monitor any kind of extra-curricular activities." He suggested that it might require having an Arabic-speaker observe the prayers.

JDL director Meir Weinstein said the organization's primary concern is that radical Islamic groups that "advocate political Islam" support the prayer sessions. Pointing to instances of Muslim leaders who attack Jews during prayers, he said, "If I was a student today and if Muslim prayers were said today, and how they are about Jews, I'd be more than uncomfortable. It would be outrageous."

Torontonian co-founds kindergarten in Ramla

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

As part of a class assignment five years ago, Lianne Merkur wrote a business plan for a school serving Jewish and Arab children in Israel.

The Toronto native's vision – tweaked and fine-tuned – is now on its way to becoming reality.

Merkur, 23, is co-founding a kindergarten with her 29-year-old boyfriend and business partner, Jalil Dabit, a Christian Arab community youth advocate, in Ramla, Israel. The Circle School (www.circle-school.org.il) will serve three- to five-year-olds.

The couple's partnership is "really unusual," Merkur said in an interview during a trip home to visit family this spring. "We both come from a place where we wanted to understand other cultures. We actually live by what we want to teach at the school: no bias, no prejudice, no judgment."

Merkur, who recently completed her BA in conflict resolution, spent six months in Ramla as part of a program for Jewish youth in the Diaspora. She wasn't familiar with the city, and at first thought she was being sent to the Palestinian city of Ramallah in the West Bank, she said.

She was immediately taken with the beauty of Ramla – which is 15 minutes from Tel Aviv, and 30 from Jerusalem – and its Old City buildings dating back to the Ottoman Empire. However, she noted, the community is struggling socio-economically.

As well, she added, neighbourhoods and schools tend to be ethnically segregated and students don't mix much with their peers from other groups.

A mid-sized city with a population of about 70,000, Ramla has a majority of Jewish residents and an Arab population of about 20 per cent.

"I think education is the best way to overcome stereotypes," Merkur said. "If you don't integrate people, they can't understand each other."

Merkur, who attended Jewish day schools as a youngster, said that, as the child of an Israeli mother and a Canadian-born father, she grew up with a dual identity and looks to Canada as a model of pluralism.

What distinguishes the Circle School from other multicultural schools in Israel, Merkur believes, is that others emphasize Jewish-Arab relations. "I feel if you put a label on it, you're emphasizing the difference, and saying this is the problem."

As well, she noted, there are other divisions in Israeli society, such as those between immigrants and sabras. "This is a school for everybody."

With a team of volunteers – including Merkur's father, who is on her board – she is preparing for a September 2012 opening and looking for supporters who will subsidize the school. Although tuition costs will be comparable to those in government-supported schools in Israel, she expects that many of the students will come from low-income families and will need subsidies.

In the spring, her team began writing grant applications. They are working with several organizations to secure a location as well as logistic and financial support in starting the school.

While in Toronto, Merkur visited schools here to see how they teach pluralism, met with a representative of the City of Vaughan, which is twinned with Ramla, and organized a parlour meeting to kickstart a cultural exchange between Vaughan and Ramla – a project she is still working on.

Beth Din issues advisory on inappropriate touching

Compiled by CJN Staff

A historic advisory issued earlier this summer by Montreal's Beth Din of the Vaad Ha'ir that parents should teach their kids about inappropriate touching was praised by some for bringing a usually taboo issue out in the open, but criticized by others for not going far enough.

Issued before camp season, the rabbinical court advised parents to tell their children that it's an obligation to report such touching – no matter by whom – to a parent or rabbi.

But critics said it didn't go far enough and that such incidents should also be reported to authorities such as youth protection officials and police.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, thinks the advisory, as well as statements by Orthodox groups Agudath Israel of America and the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), are a step in the right direction. "Before, rabbis pretended this didn't exist in our community."

He also noted that "they make no statement at all saying that authorities should not be called in when appropriate.

"You have to make sure there is a degree of clarity [about what the allegation actually is] before you destroy a person's career."

At the same time, he said, not going to the authorities could "destroy children's lives in terrible ways."

Earlier this summer, U.S. sex abuse expert Amy Neustein said sex abuse in the haredi community continues to be swept under the rug, with individuals who dare to go outside its confines to report it invariably ostracized or even banished.

But the Montreal advisory was also described as an unprecedented first step on the part of the haredi community to at least officially recognize that sex abuse does exist among its own and that the community had a duty to address it.

Rabbi Saul Emanuel, the Vaad Ha'ir's executive director, defended the advisory by reportedly saying its intent was not to tell people what they "should do," only that victims should not remain silent.

Meanwhile, the two American Orthodox bodies released statements attempting to clarify their positions on reporting child abuse.

Agudath Israel and the RCA were responding to what the former called "misleading claims about our stance on reporting suspected child abusers to law enforcement agencies."

The statements come in the wake of criticism over comments by a leading U.S. rabbi, Shmuel Kamenetsky, that abuse should be reported to rabbis rather than police. Rabbi Kamenetsky is vice-president of Agudah's Supreme Council of Rabbinic Sages.

In its statement, Agudah referred to rabbinic arguments that authorities should be notified when a certain threshold of evidence is met, but "where the circumstances of the case do not rise to threshold level… the matter should not be reported to authorities."

However, in order to distinguish whether the threshold has been met, the statement continued, "the individual shouldn't rely exclusively on their own judgment … rather, he should present the facts to a Rabbi."

Survivors for Justice, an advocacy, educational and support organization for survivors of sexual abuse and their families from the Orthodox world, described the comments as "dangerous," and urged Agudah to issue a retraction.

The RCA in its statement said that "Consistent with Torah obligations, if one becomes aware of an instance of child abuse or endangerment, one is obligated to refer the matter to the secular authorities immediately, as the prohibition of mesirah (i.e., referring an allegation against a fellow Jew to government authority) does not apply in such a case."

It also says that "As always where the facts are uncertain, one should use common sense and consultations with experts, both lay and rabbinic, to determine how and when to report such matters to the authorities."

Aid mission defined

Last week, the United Nations officially declared that the southern Somali regions of Bakool and Lower Shabelle are in the throes of famine. Officials estimate that more than 11 million people are at risk in Ethiopia, Kenya and Somalia. The UN believes that tens of thousands of east Africans, mostly the frail elderly and infants, have already died in Somalia.

The hot, dry winds of drought and famine are a devastating misery of deprivation and death. But adding murder to this sorrowful human equation are the Islamist rebels of Somalia, the most dangerous of whom is the Al Qaeda-linked group called al-Shabab.

Al-Shabab believes, as religious doctrine, that it is preferable to starve than to accept aid from the West. That they do not restrict the application of their religious orthodoxy to themselves alone, but choose to impose it murderously on others is a testament to their obsessive concern for doctrinal purity and to their utter lack of concern for the lives of others.

The group has already reportedly killed many trying to escape the famine to camps in Kenya or Ethiopia. In addition, they are preventing aid from reaching the starving in southern Somalia. The UN says more than two million people there are beyond the reach of aid workers because of the interference of al-Shabab and other Islamist militants.

To its credit, the government of Canada is raising relief funds to help the starving in eastern Africa. It is also encouraging all Canadians to offer assistance by promising to match every penny raised. Minister of International Cooperation Beverley Oda, visited the refugee camps last week and then announced the creation of the East Africa Drought Relief Fund to channel foreign aid there.

The Jewish community of Canada is also engaged in relief efforts for the stricken individuals of east Africans. IsraAID, a co-ordinating body of Israeli and Jewish non-governmental organizations, has been on the ground in newly independent South Sudan helping distribute humanitarian aid supplies. Now the group is also working with fleeing Somali refugees.

IsraAID receives funds from Canadian Jewish communities as represented through UIA Federations Canada. (See the related story in this edition.) Shahar Zahavi, the founding director of IsraAID succinctly explained the urgent response by Jewish communities to the famine in east Africa. "It is our mission, consistent with Jewish values, to reach out."

In stark contrast, Al Qaeda has defined its particular mission in east Africa, too. They are committed to preventing western (non-Muslim) aid to the people of east Africa, who are, it must be pointed out, mostly Muslim, even if it means killing the starving before they can eat or drink.

Propaganda ploy gone awry

Khaled Mouammar, national president of the Canadian Arab Federation, has said that Israel is deliberately blockading Gaza "to keep the population at a near starvation level," which is a "crime against humanity." What an outrageous accusation, given that Israel supplies the essential needs of the Palestinian inhabitants of the Gaza Strip on a daily basis over land borders. In fact, every two days, Israel ships to Gaza by truck 26 times the amount of aid on the entire "Freedom Flotilla II." Furthermore, a UN commission has found that Israel's blockade of Hamas-ruled Gaza is legal and that the May 2010 flotilla raid by Israel was justified. Israel is forced into maintaining the blockade in order to prevent arms from reaching Hamas, the ruler of Gaza, which is sworn to Israel's destruction.

Mathilde Redmatn, deputy director of the Red Cross in the Gaza Strip, has stated categorically that "there is no humanitarian crisis in Gaza." Therefore, it was not entirely surprising to learn that some participants of the 2011 flotilla have publicly admitted that its real objective was to break the Israeli naval blockade of Gaza, goad the Israeli military into action and embarrass Israel in the eyes of the world, thereby indirectly increasing worldwide antisemitism. The good news is that the decision by Greek authorities to prevent the flotilla from sailing, including the "Canadian Boat to Gaza," makes it little more than a torpedoed publicity stunt and Palestinian propaganda ploy gone awry.

Israeli anti-boycott law

This is in response to Shimon Fogel's "concern" that "the recent [anti-boycott] legislation [enacted in Israel] may provide fodder for those challenging Israel's commitment to democratic principles and values" ("From left to right, North American Jews are criticizing Israeli anti-boycott law," cjnews.com, July 28). Another publication has noted that the U.S. House of Representatives foreign affairs committee has endorsed a bill that would make permanent the ban against participation in the Arab League boycott of Israel. The original U.S. law, passed in 1977, lapsed in 1994 but has since been extended by executive order, meaning at the direction of the president of United States. If legislating against the delegitimation of Israel passes the lofty democratic standards of the U.S. president and the Israeli Knesset, why not the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, 2.0?

Need distance from Beck, too

Regarding "Jewish leaders reject Norway killer's pro-Zionism" (July 28), Jewish leaders have wisely chosen to distance themselves from Behring Breivik regardless of his Zionist views. Too bad they can't do the same for others who, despite thefr pro-Israel stance, spew out other forms of racist and inappropriate rhetoric, such as the talk-show host Glenn Beck, who has, most recently, equated the youth camp in Norway to Nazi Germany's Hitler youth. Beck has been elevated to rock star status in the Jewish community, solely due to his extreme Christian fundamentalist beliefs with regard to the protection of Israel. He is an embarrassment to most Jews who value constructive discourse. Can we not find a more rational, sane Christian to champion our cause?

Jewish power and Jewish loss

— Meditations on Leiby Kletzky's murder —

By Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

On Thursday, July 21, I attended a press conference announcing the passing of a bill, C-442, a private member's bill passed on the final day of the last Parliament that created a National Holocaust Memorial in Ottawa.

I learned that Canada has the third-largest population of Holocaust survivors in the world, yet it's the last of the western nations that fought on the side of the Allies to erect a national Holocaust memorial.

As a Canadian Jewish community, we are committed to make sure the world will "never forget" the events of the Holocaust. We are familiar with the slogan "Never Again." We derive from the Holocaust important lessons for how we are to live our lives.

We have created an implicit narrative around the Holocaust that allows us to understand it – to live with it. The Nazi ideology was an outgrowth of historical antisemitism. The Nazis rose to ever-greater power because those who could have stopped them were silent and complicit. We – the Jewish people – were the victims of the most terrible crime in human history. With this understanding of events, we derive lessons for the future.

We must confront hate, we must defend all victims of bias crime, we must remain committed to fellow Jews, no matter where they are in the world, and we must support the State of Israel.

The ability to say "Never Again" – to proudly say we will never forget – gives us a sense of purpose and a sense of power. We have control over our destiny. If we do things right – if we are vigilant – we can make sure that such bad things will never happen again. We can do it.

This is a Jewish response. Our tradition contains a mechanism for such an assertion of self-control over one's destiny. It is called a vow.

"If a person will take a vow to God or swear an oath to establish a prohibition upon himself, he shall not desecrate his word; according to whatever comes from his mouth shall he do." (Numbers 30:3)

The Torah gives humankind the power to create nedarim (oaths) to bind themselves to their commitments.

Yet, in the yearly cycle of Jewish life, we only come across vows once. We all know about Kol Nidre – right before the onset of Yom Kippur, we annul our vows. On the holiest day of the year, we do not affirm and stand behind our commitments. We rather run from them. We seem to violate the spirit of the verse cited above.

Why do we give ourselves these outs? Why don't we just do what we say, as the Torah instructs?

This Israel Sun file photo of two women recalling friends who were killed by terrorists poignantly depicts the author's statement: "We sit silently in the face of loss."

This can only be answered with one classic Jewish expression, "Man proposes, but God disposes."

Kol Nidre expresses the Jewish understanding of human dreams and aspirations. We try, but no matter what our commitments, it isn't totally in our hands. We don't really have control. We can make nedarim – we can shout great slogans – but we can't always come through.

Why do we say Kol Nidre right before Yom Kippur? To acknowledge the human condition upon which the entire day is built. We don't have control. We don't have the power to protect ourselves from evil. We try and we try very hard, but we must acknowledge that a neder can only go so far. A slogan is only a bunch of words.

My children ask me, "Abba, can you make sure that the monsters under my bed won't hurt me?" "Abba when are you coming home?" "Abba, promise me you will always protect me?" I am sure your children and grandchildren ask you similar things. We answer them with nedarim –promises – that we really intend to keep at the very deepest part of our being, but we know that fate does not always give us the privilege to see these commitments through.

We are at our core powerless in the face of our human fragility and mortality. And nothing in the human condition hurts more than this.

I think we all felt this feeling recently.

On July 11, an eight-year-old boy named Leiby Kletzky went missing in Brooklyn, N.Y. Who among us who heard of his disappearance did not pray for that boy? Who did not imagine themselves as the young mother and father who allowed their little boy to walk home by himself for the first time? Who among us did not feel uncontrolled anger when we heard of the ghastly scene when the police entered the home of Levi Aron? Can anyone tell us why this happened? Can we blame this on antisemitism? Can we say never again?

We have no ability to legislate or protect against this type of cruelty. No set of laws mandating videotaping street corners can protect us from a corrupt and evil heart. No racist antisemite did this horrific crime. We as Jews have it in our gene pool and in ourselves just as much as anyone else.

There is something so humbling, so disconcerting, so sad in this quality of being human – the simple knowledge of evil. We come face to face with our powerlessness. We cannot help but acknowledge our fallibility and mortality. For all our science – we know so much about the world – we know so little about ourselves and why we do such terrible things.

We are left without a coherent story with which we can process these events. It makes no sense. What human power can we exert that will give us the confidence that our children are safe? We are inextricably left in the state of mourning.

Mourning. Silent and befuddled mourning.

It is here that we turn to our tradition.

It is this experience of loss that typifies one element of the historical Jewish experience. It is this period of the year – often referred to in Hebrew as bein hametzarim or in English as the Three Weeks – in which we, as a people, delve into communal mourning. We contemplate the great tragedies of our history: the destruction of the Holy Temple, the Crusades, the Spanish Expulsion, the Chelminski massacres, Kishinev pogroms, and, of course, the Holocaust. In Judaism, one word embodies this mourning: eicha. It is translated as "how," and it is never answered. We don't attempt to reach for a logical explanation. It is impossible. It is unanswerable. Everything is insufficient. If you look at our tradition, we don't seek for grand theories. We don't even blame the Romans for the destruction of the Temple. We are left with the humbling experience of not knowing.

We sit silently in the face of loss.

Let's leave behind our pretentious slogans for these few weeks. Let's recognize the absence of control, the flimsiness of our vows – our nedarim. The time to dream will come again. The time to build again will follow, but now, for these few weeks, let us look at our humanity. Let us look at the evil in the human soul, and, quietly, let us drink the mournful silence.

Some lessons from Tisha b'Av

Twitter notice regarding Tisha b'Av: at only 140 characters, can it carry the weight of this awe-filled day?

"Temple in flames exile east temple in flames exile west exile end sepharad destination unknown european jews gone on 9 av remembr us remembr us"

It's a heavy day, made more poignant when August sun is shining. By trying to reduce it to something imaginable, maybe the Twitter message in its starkness captures some of the agony.

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

There are no photographs of the Temple in flames, but there are reminders everywhere in Jerusalem. Imagine the young woman in the cellar of what we now call the Burnt House. Was she hiding from the flames and the shouts of marauding soldiers upstairs? Had she tried to escape as the brutal sword of a Roman soldier cut her life off, leaving us to find, 2,000 years later, her slender arm bone still lying on the stairs?

How ironic that, some 600 years before, the prophet had written, "If I forget thee, oh Jerusalem, let my right hand wither." Indeed her bone, surrounded with ash, captures some of the physicality of the day. It keeps us from forgetting.

The destruction of the Temple Mount was so torrid that the stones, we're told, literally exploded from the walls of the mount and blasted their way down into the Tyropean Valley below. There they lie today.

No wonder the ninth of Av is a fast day. I admit that I'm very poor at the exercise. Once a year is all I can manage. In Israel, oddly, I had no problem, since all around are reminders of grim, repeated, destructions. The Burnt House is only one of many in which blackened stones carry the smear of those terrible fires. The stones that erupted from the walls are another.

In fact, it's the historical record that most attracts me, rather than the book of Laments, Eicha. And that record is a very mixed bag. For historical fact, I went back to some of my history books, such as Salo Baron's magisterial Social and Political History of the Jews. The story he tells of the Second Temple period is not at all attractive.

For instance: as Roman legions surrounded Jerusalem, Jewish factions within the city were quarrelling among themselves. One faction even had two opponents executed, practically as the legions were trundling up their catapults! It was a classic case of divided we fall and, of course, fall they did.

For historical aggadah, the famous story of the priests casting the keys of the Temple up to heaven probably never happened – who would have had time in that confusion of screams and blood to think of such a symbolic act? In the crowded streets of the cramped city, no one had time for anything but escape – some through the underground tunnels that led out beyond the walls to live three years longer at hilltop refuges such as Herodian and Masada. (Irony: Herod had built them as refuges should the many who hated him ever force him to flee Jerusalem.)

Others, such as Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakkai, saw the futility of the fight and managed to escape. Again, the story of his prophecy to Titus that he would soon be emperor and his plea for "Yavneh and its scholars" is non-historic, since at the time, Yavneh was a pagan city not exactly rife with Jewish scholars.

But here history and collective memory can collide without damage.

Why should we not bewail the destruction and fratricide and at the same time realize the lessons behind the stories? The abandonment of the Temple by the priests can remind us that many had lived comfortably with the Roman ruling class. Indeed, they had, in the later years, bought and sold the office of high priest – not a worthy enterprise.

And just as surely, by creating a structure of rabbinic law to replace temple worship, Yavneh and its scholars began the salvation of Judaism. When we today say "Torah-true Judaism," we do a disservice to the actuality of the Judaism we practice. It's not the Jewish practice found in the Torah, but rabbinic Judaism, built over centuries by scholars who distilled from the materials of the Torah the edifice we now call Judaism.

It has long outlasted the temples.

Let's look at 'excellence' in different ways

School's out, so it seems appropriate to reconsider our pedagogical expectations. What do we as parents and educators want and what do students want to get out of school, aside from wanting to get out of school?

There's been a big push in higher education circles toward attaining a standard of "excellence." It's in guidelines and brochures, curriculum development resources, grant criteria and guidelines for funding. The word itself has become clichéd and even distorted. Everyone is using the word excellence as though we all subscribe to the same concept and understand it in an identical fashion. But that's a naïve approach for educators to take.

There are many paths to excellence and diverse forms and formats for exhibiting and promoting this quality of excelling. To excel is to surpass others, and even one's own previous standard performance. It's to act with distinction or produce something that's clearly superior to others. To receive this commendation is to be seen as worthy of merit and distinction, acknowledged as standing above the rest of the group. Outstanding!

But is getting an A on a paper or in a course the only arena of excellence that we have?

At one of Concordia's recent convocations, the valedictory address was given by a man whose excellence came via a unique path. He told the audience that up until 15 minutes earlier, he had only managed to graduate elementary school. Somewhere along the way, he found himself – without a high school diploma – at Concordia's door. Within five years, he managed to get himself a BA. Everyone in the audience could see that the man had excelled, yet we didn't know his grades.

His message to his graduating classmates was quite refreshing. He didn't push the "I did it, so you can too" motif of success. Rather, he claimed that no one can succeed by themselves. He asked his contemporaries to think about how many people had helped them and how they truly shared their own success with others. He thanked the teachers whom he felt were responsible for his effective time in school. He also had some wonderful and emotional words of appreciation for his family.

The address was given during ceremonies that emphasize and concretize a university's love affair with academic merit. All sorts of awards for high grade point averages are given out and acknowledged at these proceedings. In this context, his particular address gained impact.

Don't get me wrong. I think it's very important for academic merit to be rewarded. Moreover, I think it's particularly vital that academic grades mean something. In other words, I only give an A to a truly excellent paper. Grades are to be used accurately in academic circumstances. But there are other occasions when we're called upon to evaluate students and subordinates, and we shouldn't neglect to see the excellence before our eyes.

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

Concordia students who voted for their valedictorian were right on the mark.

I wonder how often that kind of success is acknowledged and how many other stories we miss. (Magazines would not rate this highly in their university evaluations.)

What about the single parent who manages to go to school and get a degree? Is there no place for rewarding the excellence in that dedication? Do we recognize the quiet commitment of the teacher who sits with students after hours? Helping students takes tremendous effort, long hours and great energy, and it's not counted in our workloads, or our paycheques.

Some schools have awards for excellent teachers, but only some are recognized, and often the quieter ones are missed. What about staff who are always ready to help with those menial jobs, without which we wouldn't find a pencil, paper or room number. They know who they are, but do you? There are so many levels of true excellence, of people working at their tasks with superior efforts and abilities.

I'm not claiming that everyone is excellent – that makes the concept useless. Quite the opposite. I want to use the word in more than one way – carefully and appropriately.

Excellence is to be desired, admired and rewarded. It's achieved by all sorts of people and found in all sorts of places.

Holocaust 101 at Yad Vashem

Sheldon Kirshner in Jerusalem

What were the antecedents of Nazi racial ideology? Who gave the order to systematically murder the Jews of Europe? When did the Allies find out about the Holocaust and what did they do to counter it? Why did they not bomb Auschwitz or the railway lines leading there?

Considered among the key questions of Holocaust historiography today, they were addressed by top-flight scholars at Yad Vashem's International School for Holocaust Studies last month. The lectures were delivered to Canadian journalists invited to Israel by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

Robert Wistrich, a professor of modern European and Jewish history at the Hebrew University, spoke on the roots of Nazi ideology.

Focusing on its chief ideologue, Adolf Hitler, Wistrich began by saying he imposed his outlook on the Nazi movement. Hitler's goal of building an ethnically homogeneous society in Germany was formed by his experiences in the multicultural Austro-Hungarian Empire, which he hated. Living in a neighbourhood of Vienna where Jews comprised about 30 per cent of the population, Hitler perceived Jews through two lenses. They were both aliens and pillars of the Habsburg monarchy.

Having been influenced by the racist pan-German movement, Hitler believed that race was of utmost importance and that Jews could never be Germans. From Karl Lueger (1844-1910), the antisemitic mayor of Vienna, Hitler learned that antisemitism could be an effective weapon in mobilizing the masses. But in one important respect, Hitler was critical of Lueger, who believed that Jews could be "saved" through baptism to Christianity.

Robert Wistrich

Starting with the assumption that Jews were members of a race rather than a religious community, Hitler identified them with materialism, decay and the rule of money and claimed that they wanted to exert political control through communism, especially in the Soviet Union. As early as 1919, fresh from his days as a soldier in the German army World War I, he called for the complete removal of Jews from Germany, but not through Russian-style pogroms.

Wistrich observed that Hitler's obsession with eliminating Jews was a function of his suspicion that one of his ancestors may have been Jewish. Hans Frank, his lawyer and later Germany's governor general of occupied Poland, investigated this matter and concluded that Jewish blood did indeed course through Hitler's veins. Hitler's grandmother, Maria, had an affair with a Jew, who may have impregnated her.

Wistrich acknowledged that Hitler had "reasonable" personal relations with Jews in pre-war Vienna. But he does not know whether he was personally antagonistic to Jews.

He added that Haj Amin al-Husseini, the mufti of Jerusalem, was the first foreigner to be privy to Hitler's plan to exterminate Jews in the Final Solution. Hitler relayed this information to the Palestinian leader on Nov. 28, 1941 in Berlin.

In another lecture, Ephraim Kaye, director of Yad Vashem's seminars for educators, described Hitler as the "driving force" behind Germany's decision to annihilate European Jewry. As he put it, "Without Hitler, the Holocaust probably wouldn't have happened."

Hitler conveyed his genocidal wishes through oral commands rather than signed orders. According to Kaye, Hitler, at a meeting on Feb. 24, 1941, orally commanded his closest associates – Heinrich Himmler, Alfred Rosenberg and Hermann Goring – to kill the Jews en masse. In April of that year, mobile killing squads, known as Einsatzgruppen, were organized for the express purpose of killing Jews.

On June 17, a few days before Germany invaded the Soviet Union, Reinhard Heydrich, the head of the SS security police, briefed Einsatzgruppen commanders of their mission in enemy territory. In January 1942, after upwards of 800,000 Soviet Jews had been murdered, the Wannsee Conference formalized the Final Solution as official Nazi policy.

Apart from the Einsatzgruppen, the perpetrators were a special SS unit under Himmler's command, German police units and next-door neighbours of Jews in German-occupied countries.

David Silberklang, a lecturer in Holocaust history at the Hebrew University and the editor of Yad Vashem's English-language publications, discussed the Allies' response to the Holocaust.

The story begins with Jan Karski, a courier for the Polish government-in-exile who was appointed to report on Poland to the Allies. Having heard of his mission, Jewish leaders in the Warsaw ghetto asked to meet him.

They met Karski in September 1942, when three million European Jews had already been killed by the Nazis and their collaborators. After observing wretched conditions in Warsaw's ghetto, he witnessed the horrors of a Belzec sub-camp, suffering something of a nervous breakdown. In October 1942, he crossed France and Spain and made his way to neutral Portugal, where he caught a plane to Britain. In London, Karski, an eyewitness to industrialized murder, told the Allies about the ongoing Nazi campaign against Jews. On Dec. 17, the Allies issued their first and only wartime public declaration condemning the treatment of Jews and warning the Germans of consequences. It was a belated declaration, he noted. By then, the Jewish death toll had reached four million.

David Silberklang

By Silberklang's estimate, the Allies had amassed sufficiently damning data about the Holocaust even before Karski showed up at their door. Enigma, the British code-breaking apparatus, had intercepted German police reports on massacres. Further, in the spring of 1942, the Polish government-in-exile delivered a devastating report on Nazi genocide in Poland to the British Broadcasting Corporation. The report, which was compiled by the Bund, the Jewish socialist movement in Poland, was publicized by the BBC's Dutch service and the Daily Telegraph in London.

On April 19, 1943, the day the Warsaw ghetto revolt broke out, Britain and the United States convened a conference on Jewish refugees in Bermuda. In Silberklang's view, the conference was designed to deflect Jewish pressure on the Allies to act forcefully. But in 1944, the Roosevelt administration established the War Refugee Board, which rescued some 200,000 Jews in Hungary.

The Allies rejected a plea to bomb the rail lines leading to Auschwitz, claiming they could easily be repaired. They also claimed they had no aircraft with the range to reach Auschwitz. This was patently untrue. Allied planes had already bombed Auschwitz sub-camps.

Silberklang ascribes the Allies' lackadaisical attitude to a combination of factors from antisemitism to preoccupation with the war effort. But in the end, one salient factor stood out loud and clear. "Morally, they didn't care enough," he declared in a stinging indictment of Allied policy.

Camp Robin Hood ready to celebrate 65th anniversary

Laura Fixman
Intern

Camp Robin Hood, founded in 1946 in Sherwood Park in Toronto, is approaching its 65th anniversary.

The first private day camp in Canada, it's now the oldest for-profit day camp in the country, according to the Camp Robin Hood website.

Howie Grossinger, co-owner and director of the camp, now located in Markham, Ont., has been involved with it for 25 years. He said that the camp has been successful over the years because of its family atmosphere and its focus on traditional camp experiences.

"Families have felt connected to us through the spirit of camp, and we get to see the kids grow up over the years," Grossinger said. "The social aspects of camp have been our priority."

Grossinger's in-laws, Larry and Pearl Bell, are co-owners of the camp and have been involved with Camp Robin Hood for 50 years. His daughter also works at the camp, and he said it's common to see campers become counsellors and later senior staff.

He added that although the camp maintains the traditional program that has existed there since it was founded, there have been some changes in the past 25 years.

In the mid-1980s, the camp began offering specialized programs, one of them a sports camp called Robin Hood Sports Academy, which includes instruction and practice in several sports, among them baseball, basketball and tennis, he said.

Since 2003, Robin Hood has also operated an overnight facility, Camp Walden. Grossinger said that many children start out at Robin Hood and go to Walden when they're older. He added that the camp is now more accessible to everyone.

"It's changed in the degree to which we meet the needs of campers with all abilities," he said. "My wife's an occupational therapist, and we make sure all kids get the same camp experience."

Grossinger said that the location of Camp Robin Hood is part of what makes the experience special for kids. Although it's a day camp, it has the same spirit and closeness as an overnight camp.

"It's in the country and most kids have to take a bus to get there, so that seems to make it extra special," he said.

Grossinger said there are bound to be challenges with a 65-year-old business, adding that to reach that milestone, Robin Hood had to adapt to stay competitive with other camps.

"The focus on the staff members is essential and so are the connections that we make with the kids," he said. "We want to maintain a traditional camp experience, where the kids get to try a lot of new things, though we recognize that the desire for specialized camps is out there."

The anniversary celebration will be held in mid-August. Parents and former and current campers are invited.

Still going strong

Just a few weeks from celebrating her 90th birthday, Varda Hall Berenstein, who has led a life marked by war, love, loss, joy, music and education, isn't content to sit back and watch the world go by.

"People ask me, 'Varda, how come you're still so young?' Because I'm interested. Every day I want to learn something. If I don't know, I sit down and do my research," said Hall Berenstein, who has performed, taught and lectured for Jewish audiences since she immigrated to Toronto from Switzerland in 1949.

Hall Berenstein, who calls herself a "5-foot-9 accident," was born in 1921, 13 years after her older sister. She remembers her hometown of Basel, Switzerland, as a "very Zionist city."

So Zionist, that Basel's small, but active Jewish community hosted the first Zionist Congress in 1897, which was led by Theodor Herzl.

"We didn't have a very rich house, but a very open house, a very warm, Jewish, Zionist home," Hall Berenstein recalled.

"On weekends, whoever could, would come to our house, sing in Yiddish and play the clarinet," she added, describing the musical environment that fostered her love of singing.

"But in those years, to send a child to study music, that was not proper. Especially in the small Jewish communities... Going on a stage was [scandalous]."

Recognizing her talent, her parents decided to send her for singing lessons.

She studied singing in Basel with an opera singer, and in Rome at the National Academy of Santa Cecilia. She was the first to sing Zionist songs on Switzerland's national radio program, Beromuenster.

With the onset of World War II, Hall Berenstein continued to share her musical gift with her community, she said, as she does in a lecture she gives in Toronto called "Growing up in Switzerland as a Jew from 1921 to 1949."

She gave concerts to Jews who had escaped the Nazis and were living in Jewish refugee camps in Switzerland.

"There were more Jewish refugees than there were Jewish citizens, and the Swiss government made us pay [taxes] for them," she said.

Hall Berenstein was also a member of Hashomer Hatzair, a Zionist organization that resisted the Nazis during the war.

She recalled working night after night to secretly acquire passports for Hungarian Jews who were trying to escape Nazi-occupied Hungary, and to send care packages with almonds and tuna to the refugees in the Swiss camps.

Although Switzerland is considered a country that was neutral during the war, "it was Switzerland that made the Germans put a 'J' into the Jewish passports, so that when [Jews] came to the border, they would recognize them and send them back," she said.

Thousands were turned away, she said, but more than 21,000 Jewish refugees managed to gain entry into Switzerland's camps, where Hall Berenstein would visit to perform Yiddish and Zionist songs.

After the war, she continued performing for Holocaust survivors at hospitals.

"From Bergen-Belsen, we got children transported to a hospital where people with tuberculosis came... I went there to sing to them. They had them in the hall and their doctors said some children could not come because they were too ill. So I went from bed to bed to sing to them," she recalled, choking back tears.

"I'm still upset about it. They were too sick. They had survived all that, they came to Switzerland, and they were too sick [to get] their life back. Some [survived], but many didn't."

Hall Berenstein said a risky decision to marry the late Elie Borowski, founder of the Bible Lands Museum in Jerusalem, completely changed the course of her life.

Because she married Borowski, a Jewish refugee, Hall Berenstein lost her Swiss citizenship. "That was the law. I had to leave," she said.

In 1949, Hall Berenstein, with her 10-month-old son, left the only home she had ever known and followed her husband to Toronto, a new land with a new language and a completely different life.

She divorced Borowski soon after her arrival, and there were times when life was difficult – working in a factory to make ends meet, the tragic loss of her son in a plane crash in 1973, just weeks before his wedding day – but there were also good times.

She remarried, gave birth to a daughter at 41, fulfilled her dream of singing on the stage, indulged her passion for teaching, and earlier this month, she welcomed her second grandchild into the world.

For 25 years after Hall Berenstein immigrated to Toronto, she performed for Jewish communities from Winnipeg to St John's, on behalf of the United Jewish Appeal and the Jewish National Fund.

She said one of her fondest memories was performing for former Canadian prime minister Lester B. Pearson at a Negev Dinner in Montreal.

A truly inspiring internship

Jessica Pollock
Special to The CJN

This summer, I have been fortunate enough to take part in the Kohn Summer Internship. This internship is a unique program that employs summer students at various Jewish non-profit agencies in the community for a 10-week educational and hands-on experience.

I was placed with the Kehilla Residential Program, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's official agency for affordable housing. At Kehilla, I've taken part in many areas of the organization: I've developed and continue to manage the social media platforms; I assist in designing promotional materials, compilé databases for various projects, and I'm taking a key role in the event-planning co-ordination and strategies for Kehilla's first annual Sukkahville Design Competition.

Aspiring to a future in working with charities and fundraising, I came into this internship wanting to acquire beneficial experience in the Jewish non-profit world. I wanted an insider's look into how a small-scale non-profit agency such as Kehilla operates and a better conception of the need for it in our community. I am both proud and honoured to say that I gained everything I hoped for and more.

Throughout my middle and high school years, I was never properly informed about and thus never understood the issue of Jewish homelessness and poverty in the GTA. It was overwhelming to me that amid all the success and prosperity that our community has achieved in Toronto, the number of Jewish people below the poverty line is nothing less than shocking – roughly 20,000 people. But as devastating as this statistic is, it only reminds me of why I, among others, was attracted to this internship in the first place, namely, a simple commitment to tikkun olam, repairing the world.

What sets the Kohn Summer Internship apart from similar programs is that interns congregate together every Friday, separate from their respective agencies, to listen to Jewish leaders and professionals, who conduct seminars or give lectures, and to volunteer in the community at different institutions. These Friday sessions have truly allowed me to put my work in perspective.

The weeks are perfectly balanced: I complete my tasks from Monday to Thursday at Kehilla, consisting of behind-the-scenes work that I know will be of great help to people when the projects come to fruition. Yet I am given opportunities to attain instant gratification through our Friday volunteering by being of direct assistance to those in need.

I graduated from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Campus last year, and after 14 years in the Jewish education system, I was convinced that this was enough to prepare me for university and the future. Yet, throughout my first year of university, I missed my former Jewish education and its virtues and lessons, which seemed so commonplace in both elementary and high school.

This internship came at the perfect time to stand as an informal extension to my years of formal Jewish education. It is as if all the values and principles I was instilled with had now come together to form the very foundation of the program.

In addition to my workplace experience and the informal Jewish educational aspect, I have been exposed to a remarkable group of other like-minded young adults. All 15 of us are from diverse backgrounds, yet we all share in common the critical value of becoming active Jewish leaders and championing issues in our community.

This summer, I was given the opportunity to be inspired. The professionals at Kehilla, the individuals I have come in contact with on Fridays and of course the other interns themselves have all motivated me to continue giving back to a community that has already given so much to me.

Social action is part of the very essence of Judaism. As the next generation and the future of our community, we all hold the ethical responsibility to continuously practice tikkun olam in the hope of creating a more noble and just society.

Sar-El: my way to thank Israel's soldiers

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

I booked my trip to Israel this summer with the goal of participating in a program that would contribute something to the Jewish state. What I never really considered, however, was what that program might give to me, other than a way to meet new people and to keep myself from burning to a crisp on the Tel Aviv beach.

I chose to volunteer for the Israel Defence Forces through the Sar-El Volunteers for Israel program. I was promised two weeks living on a military base with a group of young people from around the world, doing odd jobs while catching a glimpse of the day-to-day life of my Israeli peers.

After completing the Birthright Israel program last summer and becoming friends with the Israeli soldiers on my trip, I felt this would be the perfect way to show how much I appreciated their efforts to protect the homeland.

Early on a Sunday morning in June, I met 12 other Sar-Elniks from as far away as France and Australia and we boarded a bus to the north of Israel to settle into our new home – the base.

As we neared the end of the bus ride, I got excited. I couldn't wait to make new friends and to be issued the olive-green uniform that so many of my family members had worn.

When we arrived, I was too excited to think twice about the rickety bunk beds and thin mattresses that were standard in our army living quarters. Far from missing my own comfortable bed at home, I was thrilled to be getting a somewhat authentic IDF experience.

The next morning, we began our daily routine of working in nearby outposts fixing camouflage netting, or working in the kitchen, but, as I soon realized, it wasn't just the work we were doing that made this program important.

In the evenings, when the work was finished and dinner eaten, we had the chance to mingle with the soldiers, including our group leaders, or madrichot. Though I have cousins and friends serving in the IDF, the experience of hanging out with the soldiers on the base was different than anything I had done before.

They were almost always in uniform, half uniform, or toting their weapons on their backs, so it was impossible to forget that our new friends who were laughing and playing games with us were, at the same time, responsible for the safety of the amazing country we were visiting.

As I sat with them, I was overcome by a desire to thank them, to tell them how incredible what they do every day is, even if it doesn't seem that way to them.

The more time we spent together, the more I thought about how strange it is that my peers in Israel and I lead similar, yet fundamentally different lives. While I might invite my friends to my house to watch a movie over some popcorn, my new friends in Israel invited me to sit outside their barracks over cola and Bamba snacks, just to chat.

I slowly realized that I had taken for granted the work my friends in the IDF do to protect Israel. I had made a separation I my mind between their civilian and army lives, whereas they don't have the option to make that distinction.

When I stood in line at the flag-raising ceremony on my last day on the base, my uniform thrown on haphazardly in stark contrast to the neat and tidy soldiers, I felt an enormous sense of unity. Watching the blue-and-white flag rise over the morning sun, I was humbled by the dedication of the soldiers, now friends, beside me, and I realized that there was no better way I could have spent my time in Israel.

Tisha b'Av demands much of us

By Rabbi Uri Kaufman

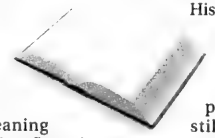
The most difficult day in the Jewish calendar to observe is Tisha b'Av, a day of mourning for the destruction of the Beit Hamikdash, the Temple in Jerusalem, and the exile of the Jewish people from the land of Israel for close to two millennia. We fast and sit on the floor. We read the Book of Lamentations, authored by Jeremiah the prophet, bemoaning the devastation of the Temple and the nation. Kinot, hymns of mourning, are recited detailing this tragedy and many other historical calamities. We recall and mourn Jewish catastrophes throughout history, including the Holocaust.

In the shtetl or the Jewish ghetto, imprisoned by threats or memories of pogroms, a Jew could internalize the essence of Tisha b'Av. Holocaust survivors understand it. But we, their children and grandchildren, have a much harder time. To feel the sense of exile and mourning for Jerusalem, as we leave our homes, get into our cars, go to shul and bemoan the Jewish Galut (Diaspora) is a great challenge. To connect to a world of desolation and sadness from a place of blessing and plenty is easier said than done.

Tisha b'Av, however, has another aspect – it's a day of tshuvah – introspection, self-analysis and return to God.

The ultimate purpose of our mourning is to enable us to understand the true impact of the loss of the Temple, the squandering of our closeness to HaShem. Sinat chinam, unwarranted hatred of our fellow Jew, is the primary reason given for the destruction of the Temple. To think about our own personal relationship to HaShem and his Torah, to honestly think of ways to improve our behaviour toward others can make Tisha b'Av meaningful.

Rabbinic Reflections



Another layer of meaning that's part of Tisha b'Av is reflected in the Talmud. The rabbis comment on a verse in the book of Jeremiah saying that in a secret place, HaShem himself cries over the destruction of the Temple and the glory of the Jewish People that was stripped from them. Just as a father who is forced to discipline his wayward son will turn his head and silently cry, so too does HaShem cry for his children.

The Kabbalists tell us that as we pray for the rebuilding of the Temple and mourn its destruction, we should recall the great pain that HaShem suffers as a result of our Galut, and the tears He sheds. When we contemplate how many of our people are distanced from our tradition, we can begin to feel the pain of the Father whose children are no longer at His table and we can mourn. A parent, who, God forbid, cries while saying Kaddish for a lost child, can unfortunately relate to this concept. Over time, those tears become hidden and mix with the tears of HaShem for His children.

When we take a hard look at our disharmony, here and in Israel, we see the poison of sinat chinam still eating away at our Jewish unity and we can deeply mourn.

Tisha b'Av demands much from us –no less than connecting with ourselves, our God, and our nation.

Rabbi Uri Kaufman is rav of Agudas Yisroel Anshei Kielce congregation and Associate Principal Eitz Chaim Schools Patricia campus in Toronto.

Reena

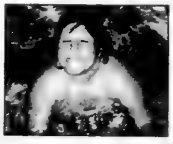
Reena in the News

Camp Northland Experience

Camp Northland, in partnership with Reena, offers special needs children the chance to go to overnight camp. Families are able to choose one of five sessions.

In the partially integrated program, the children from Reena share the same cabin and participate in all the camp's activities as a group. This allows for a higher staff-camper ratio so participants with more challenging behaviours can be included. Reena's staff goes to pre-camp training with Camp Northland staff, and integration is encouraged wherever possible.

Rebecca's Story



Rebecca was a camper at Reena's South Day Camp in Toronto. When the opportunity arose, with encouragement and support from Reena, she tried overnight camp at Northland for one week of partial-integration. The next year she returned for three weeks as a fully integrated camper and has never looked back.

Her mother attributes the success of transitions and the enthusiasm of her participation to the support and responsiveness of the directors and staff of both Reena and Camp Northland. She writes in letters of appreciation to them, "We had to trust that you listened, understood, were prepared, and could respond if things didn't go exactly as planned. And based on what we've seen, that is exactly what happened. We've benefitted from great programming and wonderful, committed staff. We are truly grateful from the bottom of our hearts."

"On Visitors' Day, the first thing Rebecca said to us was, "Do I have to go home yet? I want to stay!" As she proudly showed us around the camp, we met many staff and campers who warmly approached and greeted her; it was clear she felt like she belonged. Ten days later, a tanned, but bitten and extremely happy girl bounded off the bus and exclaimed, "Can I go back next year?"

A sad lack of vision

As we have often noted, economic decisions reflect moral choices. As the world economy slowly recovers from near catastrophe, another potential disaster looms in the horizon, that of the United States government defaulting on its debt. While families understand that they cannot live beyond their means, governments worldwide seem oblivious to this fact. After all, they can just print money as needed.

Decisions that would lead to personal bankruptcy if made by an individual are often applauded when made by impersonal governments. It's this depersonalized attitude that enables people to cheat the system by evading taxes. These same people would never dream of shoplifting. The fact that the former is far worse –repentance may not be possible for those who steal from the public purse – does not enter the equation. The lack of direct personal contact dulls our moral senses.

It's this same depersonalization that's the root cause of many corporate immoral activities perpetrated both by and against the corporate entity. While this may explain the behaviour, it doesn't justify it, especially when we're talking about those who lead our nations. The notion that the way to solve potential default is to raise the debt ceiling would be laughable if it weren't so serious.

Jewish law long ago proscribed living beyond one's means, and much rabbinic legislation was enacted to curb excessive spending. This is especially true in the area of fulfilling our religious obligations, where one may be easily carried away in a misplaced desire to serve God.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The idea of saddling our children with the effect of our massive spending appetites is reflective of our society's desire for instant gratification in all its forms. Restraint, patience and modesty are foreign concepts for much of the world, where instant gratification rules. The Talmud heaps great praise on those who plant today knowing the fruit will only be available for future generations. Instead, we eat today though the cupboard is bare, picking the fruit before it even ripens.

When our leaders do recognize the need for great restraint, even austerity, they almost always lack the political will to carry out what is needed. The notion of "involvement in communal manners faithfully" – i.e., being willing to risk losing the next election – is one few entertain.

It's this focus on today that explains how the fortunes of companies can rise and fall based on earnings over a three-month period. Companies that have been making millions and billions year after year can see billions wiped off their market value because earnings over a three-month period were one penny short of "expectations." The horrendous business decisions made by executives concerned more about quarterly profits rather than the long-term health of a company are both sad and, truth be told, very often immoral.

The recent troubles at Research in Motion are to a large degree related to it being one, two or – heaven help it – even three quarters late in releasing its latest products. It may well be that the launch delay could be catastrophic for this $20-billion company, but such a fate says much about our society's inability to think long term.

Tisha b'Av: consolation comes from discussing our travails

This coming Tuesday, the fast of Tisha b'Av marks the end of the "Three Weeks" – the period of national mourning each summer that recalls a number of Jewish tragedies, especially the destruction of the First Temple and Second Temple in Jerusalem, in 586 BCE and 70 CE respectively. Many Jews find the Three Weeks challenging, since it is hard for us to feel the pain of the loss of Temple in Jerusalem and, more generally, we here in the free world are not direct victims of the sad litany of tragedies that have befallen our people over the ages.

A new book by Erica Brown, In the Narrow Places: Daily Inspiration for the Three Weeks, attempts to make this period more relevant to modern North American Jews. Brown has an excellent reputation as a gifted adult Jewish educator. In a recent op-ed piece in the New York Times, David Brooks wrote: "Brown's impact stems from her ability to undermine the egos of the successful at the same time that she lovingly helps them build better lives. She offers a path out of the tyranny of the perpetually open mind by presenting authoritative traditions and teachings. Most educational institutions emphasize individual advancement. Brown nurtures the community and the group."

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

Her latest book consists of short essays to be read for inspiration on each of the days of the Three Weeks. Each chapter finishes with a kavanah, a suggestion of a practical activity that the reader might do to internalize the ideas in the chapter. (For example, "Today do one small act of kindness for someone you don't know. Help hold up our fragile world.") Not every chapter and not every kavanah spoke to me. But any Jew open to learning, reflection and self-improvement will find some uplifting and inspiring ideas here.

Brown, for example, argues that American society today is largely ahistorical. (She cites examples from the United States, but the same is true of Canada.) "This does not mean that we despise history or repudiate it; it is enough that we ignore it. American holidays are generally commemorated without a historical context; the rituals that are celebrated are neither deep not transformational. They are surface sacraments... Memorial Day is not observed as a mourning period for the loss of soldiers; it is a day of barbecues, sales and public pool openings. There is a shallowness about it all..."

Brown argues that Judaism, on the other hand, fosters memory and historical consciousness. "Since memory is so unreliable and yet so necessary for Jewish life, the sages of the Talmud codified practical memory triggers around holidays and historical events." She suggests that the true consolation that we might seek from the Three Weeks cannot come from ignoring the travails of the past but from discussing them openly, just as mourners in a shivah house are encouraged to talk openly about their loss. On the national plane, too, "consolation is not meant to be a distraction. It is not about looking elsewhere, in the future, to the side, somewhere other than despair.

Consolation is about looking exceedingly closely at a past from which it is all too easy to turn away and deriving meaning and comfort from it."

I was reading Brown's inspiring words a few weeks ago as I travelled with my son through France and Germany. Here lived the great minds of Ashkenazi Jewry –Rashi (1040-1105), his teachers, his descendants, and his followers. I could really feel the contrast between European cities, brimming with history and historical consciousness, and our North American cities, where a building or monument is considered old if it dates to the nineteenth century.

As we walked though Troyes in France, we passed a cathedral with a large sign on it saying that Joan of Arc together with Charles VII heard mass in that very same building in July of 1429. In Worms, Germany, we saw impressive monuments to Martin Luther, displaying quotations from his strident defence against charges of heresy in that city in 1521.

But the particular history that my son and I were looking for in Troyes and Worms wasn't visible. No traces of pre-modern Jewish life have survived in Troyes, where not only Joan of Arc visited but also where Rashi lived, taught and wrote his monumental works. The ancient Jewish cemetery – where Rashi presumably was buried – became a built-up city neighbourhood at least 700 years ago. The "Rue de la Synagogue" in the old city of Troyes contains no synagogue but a very large church, more than 500 years old. A sign near the entrance suggests that the church may have been built on the site of the old synagogue of Troyes. So you can walk through Troyes, as we did, and see the general area where Rashi probably is buried, the street where he probably went to synagogue and the streets on which he and his family probably lived. But no sign of Jewish life – or even of Jewish death – survives in any of those places.

Ironically, the situation is marginally better in Worms, Germany, where Rashi, historians claim, studied as a young man with his teacher, Rabbi Isaac ben Elazar ha-Levi. Some remnants of medieval Jewish life can still be found – mostly because of the sensitivity of the West German government to their burden of guilt after World War II. The government has reconstructed Jewish life wherever it could, in many fascinating ways.

As my son astutely observed: "We Jews have done a good job of preserving our intellectual history even as Europe has done a lousy job of preserving our physical history."

Brown's suggestion that it is crucial for Jews to have rituals that create and embed a strong historical consciousness in us rings true. Ideas are, of course, more important than relics. But especially since the artifacts have so often been destroyed or lost, rituals, like those of the Three Weeks, and study of Jewish classics – like those of Rashi – and of contemporary Jewish books – like those of Brown – take on even greater significance.

In Israel, there's always a democratic spring

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

"Israel starts to feel the Arab Spring" was the headline in the July 27 print edition of the Globe and Mail for Aron Heller's AP story about mounting Israeli protests against unaffordable housing.

"In a matter of two weeks, the movement has swelled from a small gathering in Tel Aviv to a nationwide campaign that has captured the country's attention," forcing the Netanhayu government to address the matter, Heller noted. The protests have been driven by a large number of young people who've set up tents along fancy Tel Aviv streets such as Rothschild Boulevard.

In addition to the outrage over rising housing prices, Heller said that "[i]n recent months, [Israel] has experienced protests against high prices of gasoline and cottage cheese and seen lengthy strikes by social workers and doctors over low pay and harsh working conditions. The unrest also appears to be inspired by the success of demonstrations in neighbouring Arab nations."

While Heller did not provide any evidence for his analogy to the Arab experience, he was far from alone in explicitly tying the Israeli protest movement to protests in the Arab world, in particular in Egypt, and specifically Cairo's Tahrir Square.

For instance, on the same day, Joel Greenberg wrote the following from Tel Aviv in the Washington Post: "The [housing protest] movement, which has mobilized Israelis in ways that weighty questions of war and peace have not, shows the influence of the Arab Spring, emulating not just its organization methods but also some of its slogans. 'Corner of Rothschild and Tahrir,' read a hand-lettered banner at the tent camp here, invoking the Cairo square that was the epicentre of the Egyptian revolution this year."

The media may fairly be criticized for often living in a frozen moment, latching onto convenient tropes and ignoring the history and tradition of a society. In Israel's case, while an enormous amount of attention has been devoted year after year to the Arab-Israeli conflict, very little attention has been paid to the Israelis themselves, with the exception of "the settlers."

This has led some veteran observers of the Israeli scene such as Jim Lederman, senior Israel analyst for Oxford Analytica, to argue, as he has in talks to Diaspora Jewish communities, that Israel is the most reported on but least understood country in the world. The facile analogy between Rothschild Boulevard and Tahrir Square is just the latest illustration of the media's failure to understand the nature of Israeli society and its vibrant grassroots democracy, which includes a long history of protest movements.

In conversation, Lederman reflected on this tradition with bluntness: "What has been written about this comparison is rubbish. Roughly once a decade, for more than four decades, the Israeli public has massed against its own government. Does anybody remember Motti Ashkenazi's protest against the government in the wake of the 1973 war? Or world-famous economist Michael Bruno's mass appeal to halt hyper-inflation in the early 1980s? Or the 'Four Mothers' who, starting in the mid-1990s, eventually forced the government to withdraw from south Lebanon? Or Maj-Gen. Uzi Dayan's campaign, seemingly at all odds, including against intense opposition from the right, to build the security fence during the second intifadah at the turn of the millennium?

"According to a poll conducted just a few years ago, only 13 per cent of the Israeli public trust the political party they actually voted for. For that reason, Israelis have been conducting guerilla warfare against their government for years. Most of the rebellions take place in Hebrew and often end in Supreme Court judgments that foreign correspondents are totally unaware of. Mass demonstrations, such as the one we are currently witnessing in Israel, led by the middle class that has to take time off from work or study, erupt when skirmishing fails. The Israelis have no need to be educated by or take their lead from anyone else. What's not understood in the West is that, in the end, the Israeli public makes all the existential decisions."

'I'm a born teacher'

Hall Berenstein's Jewish musical experience also includes her years as Associated Hebrew Schools' first music teacher (she is the only surviving teacher from the original school on Brunswick Avenue in Toronto).

And her passion for teaching has never fizzled. "I'm a born teacher, I love to teach," she said.

Twice a month, she teaches a course in her home titled "Learning Yiddish through song," and in addition to her lecture about growing up in Switzerland, she also speaks about Yiddish folksongs by Mordechai Gebirtig.

She's working on two more talks about the songs of the chalutzim (pioneers) and the righteous gentiles of Switzerland.

Watching her sit at her computer to scroll through her e-mails, and scoot around her downtown apartment to find old photos, it's easy to forget that on Aug. 29, she'll be celebrating her 90th birthday.

Hall Berenstein could hardly contain her excitement when she spoke about performing at her birthday celebration in October for 100 of her close friends and family.

"Beyond the Pale, the Klezmer group, which I think are the best, will be there, and we're probably going to do something together," she said.

"I was born for the stage," she added with a laugh.

On Tisha b'Av, weep for the BJCC!

Guest Voice

By no stretch of the imagination could I be compared to the prophet Jeremiah, who predicted and witnessed the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Holy Temple in the year 586 BCE. Likewise, I cannot compare the demolished Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) to the destroyed Jerusalem Temple, whose destruction we mourn on Tisha b'Av.

Yet whenever I pass the site of what once was a splendid community centre and now lies in ruins, I feel like tearing my clothes just as Jews did in ancient times when they passed the ruins of the Temple.

Yes, I knew it was wrong. On Oct. 24, 2007, I wrote a letter to the Toronto Board of Rabbis. I tried to rouse my colleagues to join in a protest against the destruction of the "Y", as it was popularly called. It was just shortly after the government of Ontario had dashed our hopes that Jewish day schools might receive some financial support from the province. Here is a slightly shortened copy of my letter.

Rabbi Erwin Schild

"I have been informed that the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on Bathurst Street, including the Leah Posluns Theatre, will be razed completely in the year 2009 to make room for a new larger and better facility at the cost of $350 million. Forcing myself to use only moderate words of condemnation, I consider this plan ill-advised and harmful, and an irresponsible use of communal financial resources.

"Some of my objections are related to the recent rejection of public funding for Jewish and other faith-based schools in Ontario. Though I expect that efforts in this cause will eventually succeed, right now our community has to find ways to relieve the burden of impossibly high tuition fees. Three hundred million dollars would go a long way toward providing for Jewish education as a communal responsibility.

"A Jewish community centre of the intended size and opulence would probably put similar facilities sponsored by other groups and organizations in our region to shame. It would present a false image of Toronto Jewry and needlessly provoke jealousy and envy. How could we plead for public support of our day schools on the basis of financial hardship for parents?

"Does it make sense and is it morally and halachically defensible to destroy a serviceable, handsome and adequate building, merely 50 years old, that could be repaired and renovated if necessary at a fraction of the cost of erecting a new one? In addition, the razing of the existing building would cause painful collateral damage. Hundreds of present users of the BJCC would be 'homeless' for a long period of time. The She'arim Day School, a highly deserving educational facility now housed in the building, would be ejected, after just having paid for required renovations.

"With cordial greetings,
Sincerely,
Erwin Schild"

I failed to move my colleagues. The funds for the new centre, they claimed, were destined for this particular purpose and could not have been redirected to education or to any other worthy purpose. It was a done deal. Why protest in vain?

However, I feel this matter should not be allowed to rest without a comment. Last week, on the first Shabbat of the "three weeks" before the Ninth of Av, Rabbi David Seed preached a sermon at Adath Israel Synagogue on "accepting responsibility." He contrasted the refusal by the Murdoch family to accept responsibility in Britain's recent journalistic phone-hacking scandal to the traditional Jewish rationalization of the destruction of Jerusalem. Rather than seeking an alibi by explaining the catastrophe as the result of superior enemy forces that they could not possibly have controlled, the leaders and teachers of the Jewish community attributed the causes of the destruction of the Judean state to their own failings and sins.

I wonder if anyone has accepted responsibility for the destruction of the BJCC. Have the decision-makers admitted that they were blinded, misguided, foolish and reckless? What can we learn from this fiasco so as to prevent similar debacles in the future? And what excuse can we offer to the hundreds of former users of the wasted facilities who were driven to join the YMCA or the facilities of other communities?

So on this Ninth of Av, let's shed an extra tear for the sad and needless loss to our community. And let us be warned that our leaders are not always right.

Rabbi Erwin Schild is rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto.

'Mutual recognition' required

"I'm sure our minster of foreign affairs [John Baird] and other ministers are discussing this issue with leaders around the world," he said.

Harper added: "I certainly had some discussions on this with the G8 leaders in France [in May]. U.S. President [Barack] Obama and most of the G8 leaders share our view that this would be a very unhelpful development."

The prime minister then reiterated that any two-state solution should be predicated on "mutual recognition, including [Palestinian] recognition of Israel as a Jewish state."

Regarding the recently released list of 30 war criminals living in Canada, The CJN asked Harper if the Jewish community should be aware of any security issues related to these fugitives.

"I don't believe so. My understanding is that none of these cases related to antisemitic activity."

Among other things, Harper also answered questions on Canadian trade initiatives with China and Latin America – he said he'll be leaving on a trip to Latin America "very shortly" to boost Canada's economic relationships there – and the potential economic impact on Canada stemming from ongoing debt negotiations in Washington.

"I'm confident the U.S. will find a way to move forward. But it should remind us that our fiscal and debt situations in Canada are comparatively much better than in the States," Harper said.

In response to a question about Opposition Leader Jack Layton's recently disclosed cancer fight, Harper said he has nothing but concern for the New Democratic Party head.

"I spoke with him a couple of days ago, and he promised me he'd be back in the House of Commons in September, causing me problems again," he quipped to some laughter. "I wish him well, and we're all behind his fight."

Harper also used the question to expound on the virtues of the democratic system and his respect for the Opposition.

"I'm now one of the longest-serving democratic leaders in the world. Though among the ones who aren't democratically elected, I haven't been around very long," he joked. "I always tell people that on the downside in a democracy is that... as leader, you don't survive your position very long. But one of the benefits is you survive a lot longer after you leave office.

"That's a joke. But in a democratic system, we learn that power changes peacefully, and we fundamentally come to understand and respect the humanity of our opponents.

"I have tremendous differences of opinion with Mr. Layton on a range of issues, but as a fellow human being, parliamentarian and Canadian, we all wish him well in his fight against cancer. This is something that can strike any one of us. I want to see him back in the House so we can fight about other things."

Alzheimer clinic aims to forestall epidemic

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The principles behind the establishment of the Jewish General Hospital's (JGH) innovative Alzheimer Risk Assessment Clinic (ARAC) and current knowledge about Alzheimer's disease risk factors, are outlined in two July articles of The Canadian Journal of Neurological Sciences (CJNS).

ARAC is considered a unique facility in Canada, designed to meet growing clinical needs and to conduct essential research to identify factors that place healthy, midlife (ages 45 to 60) individuals at risk of developing Alzheimer's.

ARAC's main objectives are threefold: to ascertain, inform and mitigate the risks of developing Alzheimer's in cognitively normal middle-aged adults based on best available medical and epidemiological evidence; to conduct scientific research on these concerns; and to develop guidelines in dementia risk assessment and management for health professionals, clinical researchers, medical residents and students.

"We set up ARAC because we recognized that there was an unmet need with respect to people at midlife who fear developing the disease, either because it runs in their family, they feel there may be other risk factors at play, or they may be experiencing personal changes in memory or other cognitive functions," said Dr. Hyman Schipper, director of ARAC, and senior author of both papers published in CJNS.

Schipper is a researcher at the JGH's Lady Davis Institute and professor of neurology and medicine (geriatrics) at McGill University.

The authors describe five general risk profiles for developing Alzheimer's in midlife: genetic, metabolic, nutritional, cognitive and psychological.

The risk categories are described as not mutually exclusive, and may present in varying combinations. Some factors – such as genetics – are fixed and immutable, but others may be modifiable through lifestyle changes, potentially affecting the probability of developing Alzheimer's.

Prominently considered among the latter are cardiovascular factors such as hypertension, high cholesterol and diabetes; poor diet and inadequate physical exercise; impoverished mental stimulation and excessive psychological distress.

"As a cure continues to elude researchers, ARAC is conducting fundamental and translational research to identify modifiable risk factors and investigate preventive strategies to stem the growing epidemic of Alzheimer's," Schipper said.

"Our expectation is that by influencing those factors that people can control during their midlife years, we can have a positive impact on reducing the incidence of dementia in later life.

"If successful, this will improve the quality of life of individuals as they age and alleviate the societal challenge of caring for our expanding elderly population."

According to Dr. Richard Riopelle, former chair of the department of neurology and neurosurgery at McGill U, the two articles published in CJNS, "represent a timely contribution to a burgeoning literature on risk and risk mitigation, and demonstrate innovative flair for how the health-care system can focus on the implementation of evidence-informed interventions."

Yad Vashem expands efforts to identify Holocaust victims

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — Yad Vashem has stepped up efforts to collect the names of Holocaust victims who still remain unidentified.

"We have a responsibility to record the names of all the Jews who were murdered by the Nazis," said Avner Shalev, the chair of Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority.

In an interview with Canadian journalists recently in Jerusalem, Shalev expressed optimism that Yad Vashem will eventually be able to account for at least five million of the six million Jews who were killed in Nazi-occupied Europe.

He held out little hope that the identities of all six million victims can be tallied and verified.

As he put it, "We can't come up with all the names. It would be very difficult to reconstruct this."

Committed to recovering every victim's name and personal story, Yad Vashem has so far collected four million victims' names, or two-thirds of the total.

The four million mark was reached late last year. By the 1990s, the identities of two million victims had been confirmed.

Shalev is hopeful that a new project initiated by Poland to record the names of all its Jewish and Christian wartime dead will help Yad Vashem accomplish its objective.

Yad Vashem has retrieved victims' names by various means.

The Pages of Testimony program, begun in the 1950s shortly after the creation of Yad Vashem, encourages survivors and family members to submit the names of relatives who disappeared during World War II.

Beyond Pages of Testimony, Yad Vashem has actively gathered and processed lists of names from concentration camp and ghetto records and deportation transports.

Thanks to sophisticated computer programs, Yad Vashem has also delved deeper into its own archives, the largest repository of Holocaust material in the world.

At present, the closely guarded archives, deep in the bowels of Yad Vashem, consist of 130 million pages of documentation, 100,000 survivor testimonies, 400,000 photographs and 15,000 Righteous Among the Nations case files.

Shalev said he has launched a campaign to collect still more survivor testimonies and to encourage survivors to write their memoirs.

Through its Witness in Education program, Yad Vashem has started filming the recollections of survivors in their respective birthplaces.

Shalev said lists of the deceased are harder to acquire as investigators move eastward. Nonetheless, progress has been made in tracking down victims' names in a host of countries in eastern Europe.

Yad Vashem has verified the names of about 35 per cent of the Jews killed in Ukraine, 37 per cent of the Jews murdered in Belarus, 46 per cent of the Jews who perished in Poland and 65 per cent of the Jews killed in Hungary.

Tabulating the names of the victims in Greece has been problematic as well.

By 2005, researchers had managed to ascertain the identities of 35 per cent of Greek victims. The figure has since risen to 70 per cent.

Norwegian Jews fear post-massacre scapegoating

Alex Weisler
JTA

OSLO — Even as they mourn along with their fellow countrymen the murder of 76 people last month in Oslo and at the Utoya summer camp, some Jews here are quietly expressing concern that the attack by a right-wing xenophobe who apparently sympathized with Israel may further mute pro-Israel voices in Norway, where anti-Zionist sentiment already runs strong.

Anders Behring Breivik

In the rambling 1,500-page manifesto attributed to the alleged perpetrator of the attacks, Anders Behring Breivik, anti-Muslim diatribes are punctuated at times with expressions of admiration for Israel and its fight against Islamic terrorism.

And on Utoya island, the young Labour Party activists who were holding a retreat when Breivik ambushed them, had spent part of the day before discussing the organization of a boycott against Israel and pressing the country's foreign minister, who was visiting the camp, to recognize a Palestinian state.

If the Norwegian public is looking for a larger villain than Breivik, Jews here are worried that Zionism and pro-Israel organizations may be singled out.

"Can the average Norwegian accept that this is the one random act of one confused ethnic Norwegian?" Avi Ring asked. Ring is a neuroscientist and former board member of Norway's official Jewish community organization, called the Mosaic Religious Community and known by its Norwegian acronym, DMT. "What I'm worried about is that in the Norwegian mind it will slowly attach an antagonism to Israel."

Joakim Plavnik, a young Norwegian Jew who works in the financial sector, said he's already worried by news reports that have focused on the seemingly pro-Zionist parts of Breivik's writings.

"That can potentially have very negative ramifications toward the small, vulnerable Jewish community," Plavnik said. But, he added, "we can't be paralyzed by that fear."

Rachel Suissa runs the Center Against Antisemitism, a pro-Israel group that counts about 23,000 supporters and 10,000 subscribers to a quarterly journal. She said the Norwegian government's general pro-Palestinian stance – Norway's foreign minister, Jonas Gahr Store, recently said that Oslo soon would announce its support for an independent Palestinian state – makes Zionism difficult to promote here.

"Anyone who dares support Israel is demonized," said Suissa, a professor of medical chemistry. "The Jews need to know that they have a lot of friends in Norway, but the Norwegian politicians are not our friends."

In an interview published last Tuesday by the Israeli daily Maariv, Norway's ambassador to Israel, Svein Sevje, said it was important to recognize the distinctions between the Norwegian attacks and terrorism in Israel.

"We Norwegians consider the occupation to be the cause of the terror against Israel," he said. "Those who believe this will not change their mind because of the attack in Oslo."

Suissa said she is concerned that Breivik's attack will make it more difficult for Israel supporters and the right-wing Christian groups she works with to express their views. But Rabbi Joav Melchior, spiritual leader of the community synagogue also known as DMT, dismissed such concerns.

"That someone… calls himself pro-Israel shouldn't in principle change anything for us," he said of Breivik. "We don't feel that he's a part of our group."

The bombing in Oslo and shooting rampage on the nearby island of Utoya has sparked a national debate in Norway about security measures in this country of 4.6 million, where political leaders routinely travel without a protective security detail and police officers don't carry guns.

"This happened in a place where if someone walks in and steals a pack of eggs, it would make the news," Ring said. "Norway will have to increase its awareness of security on all levels."

At Oslo's main synagogue, which was the target of an early-morning shooting attack in 2006 that resulted in cosmetic damage but no casualties, security already is high. Concrete barriers make it impossible to park in front of the building, and a receptionist told a reporter that he could not enter the facility last week "for security reasons."

Norway, like practically every country in Europe, has a spotty history when it comes to the Jews.

Jews were first allowed into Norway after the Inquisition, but were banned from 1687 to 1851. The first synagogue in Oslo was established in 1892. Some 800 Jews were killed during the Nazi occupation of the country, and many who fled to seek asylum in Sweden did not return after the war.

Today, most of the country's Jews live in Oslo, though smaller congregations do exist in other cities, such as Trondheim, a seven-hour drive north.

David Katzenelson, an Israeli transplant who has lived in Norway for 15 years, said Norway is not known as a particularly hospitable place for Jews. A high school math and science teacher who also runs the small Society for Progressive Judaism here, Katzenelson said he has had a swastika spray-painted on his mailbox and that Jewish students of his have been afraid to publicly disclose their faith.

"There's a feeling in the society that you have to be nice to everyone who's in the room – and since Jews are generally a very small group who are usually not in the room, you're allowed to speak nasty about them because that doesn't discriminate against anyone present," he said. "That can develop into very ugly things."

In the wake of the attacks, however, the prevailing mood among Norwegian Jews has been solidarity – as it has for all Norwegians.

More than 150,000 people participated in a "rose march" in front of Oslo City Hall on July 25 even after the event was officially cancelled for security reasons, because it had grown too large. People have taken to cheering for police officers and Red Cross workers when they pass by on the streets. And bars and restaurants are packed in Oslo in an apparent show that this city of about 600,000 will not cow to terror.

While many Norwegian Jews interviewed by JTA were quick to say now is the time for grief and that soul-searching should be put off for later, Rabbi Shaul Wilhelm, who runs the seven-year-old Chabad-Lubavitch centre in Oslo, said the way to prove Breivik and his ideology wrong is to embrace tolerance.

Judge strikes circumcision ban from ballot

Dan Klein
JTA

A state Superior Court judge in California ruled that a proposal to ban circumcision for minors must be struck from San Francisco's November ballot.

In a final ruling last Thursday, Judge Loretta Giorgi affirmed her tentative ruling from the previous day in which she agreed with the plaintiffs that the proposed ballot initiative is "expressly pre-empted" by state law because the evidence overwhelmingly suggests that "circumcision is a widely practiced medical procedure."

California law prohibits local governments from regulating medical procedures.

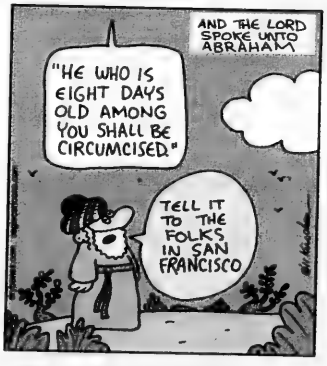
"It serves no legitimate purpose to allow a measure whose invalidity can be determined as a matter of law to remain on the ballot after such a ruling has been made," the judge said.

The initiative, if passed, would have made the practice of circumcision a misdemeanour punishable by a fine of up to $1,000 or up to one year in jail, and offered no exemption for religious ritual. The initiative had gotten on the ballot in San Francisco after anti-circumcision activists launched a campaign last fall to collect the signatures necessary to force a vote on the issue. In all, 12,000 people signed the petition to have it put on the November ballot.

Jewish groups then launched a counter-campaign, joined by Muslims and doctors, to derail the ballot initiative. They hailed Thursday's ruling as an affirmation of the right to free exercise of religion.

"We appreciate Judge Giorgi's careful review of the proposed measure, and her willingness to put a stop to this extreme, hurtful measure," said Abby Michelson Porth, the associate director of San Francisco's Jewish Community Relations Council – one of several plaintiffs in the suit – in an interview with j., the San Francisco Bay Area Jewish newspaper. "There is no place on the ballot for a measure that contradicts California law and would put doctors in jail for performing a procedure with known health benefits and a religious purpose."

Dry Bones



AND THE LORD SPOKE UNTO ABRAHAM
"HE WHO IS EIGHT DAYS OLD AMONG YOU SHALL BE CIRCUMCISED."
TELL IT TO THE FOLKS IN SAN FRANCISCO

Other Jewish leaders added their praise of this week's ruling.

"Today's ruling is a win for religious liberty, a win for American values and a win for all San Franciscans," said Howie Beigelman, the director of state affairs for the Orthodox Union. Daniel Mariaschin, the executive vice president of B'nai Brith International, said that the "ballot initiative would have directly impinged on Jews' ability to carry out a basic pillar of our faith."

Matthew Hess, the anti-circumcision activist who authored the language of the San Francisco ballot measure, told JTA that the measure's proponents were working out the details of an appeal.

"The measure didn't target one specific religion – it targeted all forced circumcisions of male minors," Hess said. "We feel that we have a strong case for an appeal."

Hess argues that circumcision is not a medical procedure, but this week the judge rejected that argument by Michael Kinane, a lawyer for Hess' coalition.

Michael Jacobs, the lawyer who represented the alliance opposing the ballot initiative, told JTA that he was pleased the judge had agreed with the core legal argument. He said that an appeal was unlikely to succeed.

Altar dating back to 9th century BCE unearthed

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

Prof. Aren Maeir crouches near the altar.

TEL AVIV — For Haskel Greenfield, a professor of anthropology at the University of Manitoba, it was another exciting summer at the Tell es-Safi/Gath archaeological site in Israel.

A multinational team of archeologists – led by Prof. Aren Maeir of Bar-Ilan University's Martin (Szusz) Department of Land of Israel Studies – made a rare find of a large stone altar dating back to the late ninth century BCE.

"We're all ecstatic," Maeir told The CJN. "Now we're working to understand its context, where it is standing at the site, to understand the contents around it."

That's where Greenfield comes in. He was invited by Bar-Ilan University to shed some light on what city life was like at the Gath site, one of the largest ancient ruin mounds in Israel that was settled almost continuously from the fifth millennium BCE until modern times.

Greenfield calls himself an "anthropological archeologist."

"Most archeologists are like historians. They try and investigate a region of history using archeology. Anthropological archeologists are interested in human behaviour," he said. "I look how this is different from other places I've worked. I try to understand the people behind the artifacts, answering questions about society, culture and the economy."

The Canadian delegation included. Greenfield, four MA students and two BA students. It was Trent Cheney's third time digging at the Gath site and fourth time digging in Israel.

"I fell in love with this country the first time I came. Partly because I'm Christian and because of the biblical aspect, to see where stories of the Bible happened, and I get to also meet Israelis and find out what things are like here," the 39-year-old Saskatoon native told The CJN.

Cheney, who is an MA candidate at the University of Manitoba, said insofar as archeological sites, this is the place to dig: "Archeologically, even if I don't find anything, it's immensely exciting. You have to see where it happened. This is one of the places mentioned in the Bible."

The Tell es-Safi/Gath Archaeological Project (www.dig-gath.org) is a long-term investigation aimed at studying the archeology and history of one of the most important sites in Israel, located in the Tel Tzafit National Park. Gath was the most prominent and powerful city of the Philistines for much of that people's existence, and Maeir believes it was at times the largest city in all of the Land of Israel, until it was finally sacked by Hazael, king of Aram-Damascus, in 830 BCE. The fall of Gath, he said, was the single most important geopolitical event of the century.

"Although we understand much about the site – and its importance for the study of the story of the Philistines and their origins and processes of change, and their relationships with the surrounding cultures – it is obvious that we have much more to learn about this site," Maeir said. "We could be here for another 20 years and still not have scratched the surface."

He has led the international digging project at Tel Tzafit, for 15 years. This year's summer delegation included experts and students of archeology, Bible, anthropology, and science from the United States, Canada, Germany, France, Switzerland, England, Spain, Italy, South Korea and Australia.

"It's very interesting working with people from different cultures, different backgrounds. It's nice that everyone can work together in co-operation and collaboration. It's a model how different people can get along together," Maeir told The CJN.

In addition to the altar recently found at the site, other significant findings found at Gath include evidence of an earthquake in the eighth century BCE. Another find were remains relating to the earliest siege system in the world, constructed by Hazael, king of Aram-Damascus, around 830 BCE, along with extensive evidence of the subsequent capture and destruction of the city by Hazael, as mentioned in Second Kings 12:18.

Last year, diggers uncovered a Philistine temple with a number of ritual items dating back to the Iron Age (10th century BCE).

"Interestingly, the architectural design of this temple, with its two central pillars, is reminiscent of the architectural image that is described in the well-known biblical story of Samson and the Philistines, when Samson knocks down the temple by standing between the pillars and pushing them down. Perhaps this indicates that the story of Samson reflects a type of temple that was in use in Philistia at the time," said Maeir when the discovery was made last year.

Diggers at the site also unearthed the earliest decipherable Philistine inscription ever to be discovered, which contains two names similar to the name Goliath. This discovery is of particular importance since the Bible attributes Gath as the hometown of Goliath. The archeological find may also be seen as the first clear, extra-biblical evidence that the well-known biblical story of the battle between David and Goliath (and, in particular, the very existence of a figure such as Goliath during the biblical period) may be based on a clear cultural background, Maeir said.

While his work is concentrated on the Philistine layer of the site, Greenfield brushes away at Area E of the dig site in search of Early Bronze Age information.

"Goliath is from the Iron Age. We're looking in the Early Bronze Age. What we're doing is directly relevant to people's lives," said Greenfield, who is already planning his return to Gath next summer. "We're demonstrating and investigating how the lifestyle we live today was started. It's less sexy and that's the dilemma I also face."

Revered rabbi murdered

Thousands of people attended the funeral of Rabbi Elazar Abuhatzeira last Friday. Rabbi Abuhatzeira was stabbed to death in Be'er Sheva while he was hosting guests for consultation at a yeshiva near his home. He was buried next to his father in Jerusalem's Mount of Olives cemetery. Police arrested Asher Dahan, 42, following the stabbing. People close to the rabbi said Dahan frequently visited him to receive blessings and advice. The 70-year-old rabbi was a popular kabbalist and grandson of Rabbi Yisrael Abuhatzeira, known as the Baba Sali, considered a sage who was able to work miracles through his prayers.

Peres holds PA talks

Ha'aretz reported that President Shimon Peres has been holding intensive talks with Palestinian Authority officials in an effort to resume negotiations and head off a unilateral Palestinian statehood bid at the United Nations in September. The meetings are being held in complete co-ordination with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Peres met with chief Palestinian negotiator, Saeb Erekat. The two tried to find a formula that would bypass the dispute over establishing the June 4, 1967, border as a basis for negotiations toward a final settlement between Israel and the Palestinians. One option explored was the exchange of territory. Another was to compensate the Palestinians for settlement blocs annexed to Israel, on the basis of the U.S. proposal that the area of a Palestinian state be equal to the territory of the West Bank and Gaza.

'Kangaroo court' seeks to slander Israel, critics say

Michael Belling
JTA

JOHANNESBURG — Ten years after the notorious United Nations anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, that devolved into an Israel-bashing frenzy, anti-Zionist forces are mobilizing again to hold another anti-Israel conference in South Africa.

This time, Israel will be on trial.

The Russell Tribunal on Palestine – a standing organization that held two tribunals against Israel last year in Barcelona and London – has been called for Nov. 5-6 in Cape Town "to probe whether the treatment of Palestinians in Israel and the occupied territories meets the criteria of the United Nations convention against the crime of apartheid."

The South African Zionist Federation has called the event, which is to involve prominent South Africans and already is making national headlines here, "an irrelevant talk shop."

Ronnie Kasrils

Mairead Maguire

"Despite its name, the Russell Tribunal is not an impartial, accountable judicial body," a vice-chairman of the South African Zionist Federation, Ben Swartz, told JTA. "Rather, it is a loose association of lobbyists pushing a narrow, one-sided political agenda, in this case the delegitimization of the State of Israel."

He called it "a pointless political smear campaign by a self-appointed group of anti-Israel activists."

But because of the attention it's receiving in South Africa, the tribunal is likely to be a damaging PR exercise against Israel. The event has won several key endorsements in the country, including from South Africa's leading federation of trade unions, the ruling African National Congress party, the South African Communist Party, and Zackie Achmat, an AIDS activist and Nobel Peace Prize nominee.

Alice Walker

Jose Antonio Pallin

While the tribunal said it invited Israel, Dov Segev-Steinberg, Israel's ambassador to South Africa, denied the claim.

"I have not seen any approach by the tribunal to Israel or the embassy," he told JTA. Segev-Steinberg said Israel views the tribunal as a "kangaroo court without any justification."

Two Israelis are slated to take part: attorneys Michael Sfard, who has represented Israelis refusing to serve in Israeli army operations in the West Bank and is legal counsel to Peace Now's Settlement Watch project, and Leah Tsemel, who represents Palestinians in cases against Israel.

Ben Levitas, another vice-chairman of the South African Zionist Federation, told JTA that the Jewish community has expressed great concern about the tribunal.

"This is not a court that reflects public opinion," Levitas said. "They have been very selective in their choice of witnesses."

The tribunal will meet at the District Six Museum, which was set up to commemorate some of the early forced removals of "Cape Coloreds," as mixed-race South Africans from a particular ethnic group in Cape Town were known, from their homes and businesses under the apartheid government.

The lineup at the tribunal is an anti-Israel parade. Nobel Peace laureate and Archbishop emeritus Desmond Tutu, a frequent critic of the Jewish state, is slated to open the proceedings.

The "jury" will include Ronnie Kasrils, the Jewish former South African minister of intelligence who gained international notoriety some 10 years ago when he promoted several anti-Israel measures in parliament; Alice Walker, the African-American author who tried to take part in this year's flotilla to Gaza and has defended suicide bombings as "last-ditch resistance"; Nobel Peace laureate Mairead Maguire, who in 2009 was arrested by Israel for sailing on a boat attempting to break Israel's blockade of the Hamas-run Gaza Strip, and Spanish Supreme Court judge Jose Antonio Pallin, who has accused Israel of war crimes.

"The world expects South Africa to champion the rights of other people," Kasrils said.

South African "witnesses" will include Steven Friedman, a Jewish proponent of the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel; John Dugard, a former UN special rapporteur on human rights in the Palestinian territories; and Winnie Madikizela-Mandela, ex-wife of anti-apartheid activist and former South African president Nelson Mandela.

"The primary purpose is to engage with the court of public opinion throughout the world, air views and start a conversation which hopefully will continue over the next few years," Friedman told JTA. The Zionist Federation, he said, is "a well-known source of propaganda. Its view is that any criticism of Israel is invalid, and it sees its job as defaming and discrediting anyone who has an alternative view of Israel."

The local organizing committee is chaired by Siraj Desai, a high court judge, and includes Nozizwe Madlala-Routledge, a former deputy minister and deputy speaker of parliament who went to Israel in 2008 to advocate for Palestinian rights.

The tribunal is named for British philosopher and mathematician Bertrand Russell, who along with philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre set up the 1960s-era Russell Tribunal on Vietnam to examine U.S. war crimes. It was followed some years later by the Russell Tribunal II on human rights offences by former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet.

The new body calls itself "an international people's tribunal created by a large group of citizens involved in the promotion of peace and justice in the Middle East." Organizers say they seek to highlight the international community's failure to implement UN resolutions and International Court of Justice decisions against Israel.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Dentists design downloadable app for iPad

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

As a dentist with 18 years of practice under his belt, Knowlton Kotansky is something of a rock star among his contemporaries.

Well, maybe not exactly a rock star – he doesn't get young dental hygienists flinging their unmentionables at him, or even asking for autographs. But at dental conferences across the country, and during a recent trip to shul, he has had colleagues come up to him and ask excitedly if he's the same guy who's offering a unique dental application for download.

Yes indeed, he is the same guy, along with his partner in dental software, Lorne Levy.

The two of them, friends for many years, have designed "a new tool in the dentist's bucket" called "The Dental Consult Application." It's a downloadable application, or software, that's available at the Canadian Apple store for use with the iPad.

Knowlton Kotansky

Lorne Levy

It's an educational tool that dentists can use to demonstrate dental procedures to their patients before they go ahead and do them.

Once it has been downloaded to the iPad, users will see nine "buckets" on the iPad's view screen, each of which, when clicked, opens a discrete set of high-quality photos that demonstrate the treatment to be taken.

For a crown, for instance, the patient is shown photographs of all the steps that are part of the procedure, from pre-op to impression stage, lab work, temporary crowns and the final crowning glory.

Since the patients see pictures of real life procedures, not simply animations, they understand what will be done, "and it relieves their anxieties a lot," Kotansky said.

So far, the nine "buckets" include crowns, bridges, implants, fillings, dentures, veneers, whitening, acid erosion and hypersensitivity.

Patients have responded well to the tool, and dentists are avid users of the application, Kotansky said. It is available for download for $4.99. "We want everyone to have it," he explained. "It's a good tool and we're happy to have everybody have it."

So far, the Apple store has registered about 360 downloads. And if you consider that Kotansky and Levy paid software developers to design it and Apple takes 30 per cent from each sale, it's clear it's not a product that will lead the dental duo to begin planning their retirements anytime soon.

"It's a little side business," Kotansky explained.

Still, there are plans for growth. Kotansky and Levy have partnered with GlaxoSmithKline (GSK) in selling the product. GSK is a heavyweight in the world of dental products, with a vast distribution network. They are marketing it to their customers and they have placed educational materials in the app in which Sensodyne, a product that addresses tooth sensitivity, is featured.

Then there is the vast American market, which is about 10 times the size of the Canadian one. "We're hoping to find a corporate partner that would like to follow us there," said Kotansky, a native of Montreal.

In the meantime, the two dental buddies are working on a non-dental application, the nature of which they won't reveal at the present time.

Expanding their dental horizions "is really enjoyable for us after years of routine," Kotansky said. "This was really a nice new challenge for us. It added a whole new level of excitement."

Israel to provide Intel with massive grant

Ora Coren
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Intel should receive a NIS 1-billion ($277-million) grant, Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz and Industry, Trade and Labour Minister Shalom Simhon decided in principle last week.

The grant is intended to help Intel invest in two factories. The chipmaker plans to expand its Kiryat Gat factory and to build a new assembly plant in the north, at a total investment of NIS 5 billion ($1.4 billion).

As a condition for receiving the money, Intel will have to commit to hiring 1,500 more workers at its Kiryat Gat plant, and between 600 and 1,000 workers at its new factory in the north. The Industry, Trade and Labor Ministry hopes the factory will be built near Beit She'an.

In addition, it will be eligible for tax breaks under a newly amended law encouraging capital investment and will become the first factory to receive special preferential status. Thus, it will pay taxes of five per cent, as opposed to the average 12 per cent that it currently pays.

Following the recommendations of a joint industry and trade and finance committee, the ministers decided to break down the grant into three sections.

Intel will receive up to NIS 300 million ($83 million) to invest in the Kiryat Gat plant, and another NIS 550 million ($155 million) to build an anchor factory that employs at least 600 workers in the north. It will receive an additional NIS 150 million ($42 million) if that factory employs 1,000 workers.

Intel will be obliged to employ the workers for at least 10 years.

The company will receive the grant money starting in 2014, depending on when it makes the investment.

Two months ago, Intel applied to receive a grant in order to double the capacity of its Kiryat Gat factory, which would enable it to manufacture its most advanced chips. The company also stated it was considering building a new factory up north.

Journalist takes on the conspiracy movement

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Toronto journalist Jonathan Kay is no stranger to conspiracy theories, the stuff of paranoia and a staple of the antisemitic lunatic fringe. Now the comment pages editor of the National Post, he was accustomed to receiving a voluminous volume of e-mails from conspiracy theorists. "I ignored most of them," he said. "I thought they were all crazy."

But after the monstrous terrorist events of Sept. 11, 2001, Kay discerned a new breed of conspiracy theorists. "They were smart, well educated, articulate and not overly bigoted."

Some years after having made this observation, Kay ran into his cousin at a dinner party. Much to Kay's surprise, he claimed that 9-11 was "an inside job" conceived and carried out by the United States to justify its armed intervention in Afghanistan.

The argument sounded ominously familiar. After 9-11, the Muslim world was awash with claims that it was planned and perpetrated by the Mossad, Israel's intelligence agency.

Intrigued by their retreat from reality, Kay decided to investigate the alternate universe of conspiracy theorists, who have thrived due to the Internet. Taking a four-month leave-of-absence from his newspaper starting in mid-2008, Kay immersed himself in the topic. When necessary, he worked evenings, weekends and vacations.

He conducted research, interviewed conspiracy theorists in Canada and the United States, attended their conventions, surfed their websites, watched their videos and joined their Internet discussion forums.

The hard work of taking an idea from start to finish has paid off. This past spring, HarperCollins published Among the Truthers, a comprehensive account of a vast conspiracist subculture. A reviewer in the Globe and Mail praised Kay's book as a "thoughtful, rigorous, very readable and often captivating journey through the renegade corners of... paranoia."

The conspiracy movement has prospered because more Canadians and Americans distrust government, the mass media and the religious establishment, he said in an interview. "People don't believe in centralized authority anymore."

And the Internet makes it possible for anyone out there to publish their skewed views, he added. "Modern conspiracism is all Internet-based, perfect for people with fringe messages," Kay noted.

By his estimate, 20 per cent of Canadians and Americans subscribe to conspiracy theories. Still others are skeptics who reject conventional explanations of current affairs.

A growing number of conspiracy theorists are right-wing Jews who fear Islamic radicalism and Revisionist Zionists who claim, for example, that Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in 2005 was engineered by non-governmental organizations.

Most conspiracy theorists were once antisemites, revelling in such fabricated works as The Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

Not so today.

Under the impact of the Holocaust, multiculturalism, tolerance training at schools, sympathetic coverage of minorities in the media and Jewish community activism, only a minority of conspiracy theorists are in the antisemitic camp, Kay explained.

Apart from legends swirling around the origins of 9-11 and the supposed power of Jews, the most common conspiracy theories turn on claims that U.S. President Barack Obama was born outside the United States, that vaccines render children autistic and that the gold bullion held by the U.S. government is nothing more than bars of tungsten painted yellow.

Kay doesn't bother trying to refute their arguments. "Once they go down that path, you can't argue with conspiracy theorists," said Kay, the co-author of The Volunteer, a memoir of a Canadian-born Mossad agent published four years ago.

Born and raised in Montreal, Kay dedicates Among the Truthers to his parents – Ronald, an engineer, and Barbara, a freelance columnist for the National Post.

Kay, 42, joined the National Post in its inaugural year in 1998. "If Conrad Black hadn't started it, I probably would have been a tax lawyer today," he said.

He is not joking.

A man of many interests, Kay was a metallurgical engineer for seven years and a tax lawyer for two years before turning his hand to to journalism. Until he discovered the joys of journalism, he didn't know what to do with his life, he admitted.

He wrote his first published piece in 1996, a film review of Independence Day for Saturday Night magazine. Ken Whyte, the editor who accepted his review, remembered Kay and hired him when he applied for a position at the National Post, which he edited for the first few years.

Launching his career as an editorial writer, Kay acquitted himself well, winning National Newspaper Awards in 2002 and 2004.

"This is a dream job for a know-it-all," said Kay, who doubles as a columnist and blogger. "The Internet is a hungry beast. It requires many words."

Kay, who's currently working on an e-book on 9-11, is a conservative and a disciple of 18th-century British philosopher Edmund Burke, a classical liberal. But since the emergence of the Tea Party movement in the United States, he wonders if he qualifies as a conservative.

In Canada's last general election, he considered voting for the New Democratic Party due to the income inequality problem that afflicts both Canada and even more so the United States. But in the end, he voted for the Conservative party because he regards its leader, Stephen Harper, as an Edmund Burkian conservative.

Kay was a supporter of Benjamin Netanyahu, Israel's current prime minister, until last year. He parted ways with him after Israel embarrassed visiting U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden by announcing plans to build more apartment units in eastern Jerusalem. "That was the turning point," he said.

Netanyahu disillusioned Kay yet again in May when he refused to accept the pre-1967 armistice lines in combination with mutual land swaps as a basis for resuming direct negotiations with the Palestinian Authority.

"I don't see Netanyahu's position sustainable on the world stage," said Kay, urging him to negotiate sooner rather than later, when Iran has most probably acquired a nuclear arsenal.

An avid tennis and squash player, Kay and his wife, Jennifer, a lawyer, have two daughters. He admires his wife, whom he met as a student at McGill University. As he put it, "She's the serious person in our relationship."

The first Jewish star in professional baseball

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Henry (Hank) Greenberg was arguably the first important Jewish player in the annals of major league baseball and thus the first Jewish star in the game.

A first baseman for the Detroit Tigers – a team that won the American League pennant in 1934, almost won the World Series that year and remained a contender for the rest of the 1930s – he is best remembered today for having been one of the first players to challenge Babe Ruth's single season record of 60 home runs and for having sat out a game because it fell on Yom Kippur.

Greenberg's decision to miss this game and attend synagogue services for the sake of observing a sacred Jewish holiday endeared him to Jewish fans and defined him for the rest of his career.

But ironically, as Mark Kurlansky points out in his first-rate biography, Hank Greenberg: The Hero Who Didn't Want To Be One (Yale University Press), this was possibly the only time in his adult life that he actually observed Yom Kippur.

Utterly unobservant, Greenberg was thoroughly secular and wanted to be regarded as a player who happened to be Jewish rather than a Jewish player per se. According to Kurlansky, he was never comfortable with the kind of adulation he received from American Jews, who saw him as a symbol of a proud Jew and a bulwark against antisemitism.

"Privately, Greenberg... was both embarrassed and amused by his image," Kurlansky writes.

For all the acclaim showered on him, Greenberg had the misfortune of living in an era when racism was rampant and casual and vocal antisemitism was the norm in American society. "As a player and later a general manager, he spent the better part of 20 years on the receiving end of antisemitic abuse in ballparks," Kurlansky says.

America has come a long way since then. The Chicago Bulls basketball player Joakim Noah was recently fined $50,000 for hurling an anti-gay slur at a taunting fan. But in Greenberg's day, verbal abuse was common and widely accepted.

Greenberg was the son of Romanian immigrants from Moldavia. Born in 1911 as Hyman Greenberg, he was raised in the Greenwich Village neighbourhood of Manhattan. Drawn to sports, he was not considered a natural talent, honing his skills by virtue of hard work.

"If you practice the way I did," he said, "all day long, day after day, you're bound to get pretty good." Indeed, teammates and opponents alike acknowledged him as the hardest working player they had ever seen, Kurlanksy adds.

He launched his career on a semi-pro team in Brooklyn in 1929. A Detroit Tigers scout spotted him and Greenberg signed with the club for $9,000. Since there were no agents back then, he negotiated his own contract. In turning pro, he gave up on a university education.

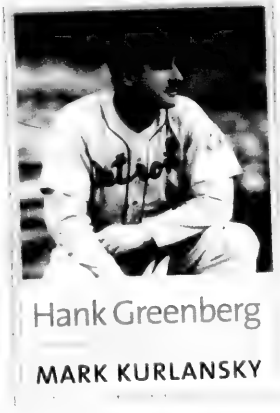
Greenberg played in the minor leagues for the first few years, finessing his game in Hartford, Conn., Raleigh, N.C., and Beaumont, Texas. "He was still inexperienced, his footwork at first base was clumsy, he missed fly balls, and even his batting was unspectacular," Kurlansky says of his days in the minors.

In Raleigh, a southern city, Greenberg encountered a mix of antisemitic hostility and curiosity from fans. "Every ballpark I went to there'd be somebody in the stands who spent the whole afternoon just calling me, you know, names," he told the American Jewish Committee in a lengthy interview in 1980.

The antisemitism in Detroit was just as bad, if not worse. Detroit, after all, was a bastion of antisemitic agitators.

Henry Ford, the car manufacturer, had published antisemitic articles in his newspaper, the Dearborn Independent, based on The Protocols of the Elders of Zion. Charles Coughlin, a Catholic priest, attacked Jews in his nationally syndicated radio program.

In his first season in Detroit, Greenberg hit 12 home runs, a respectable total. But some fans were less than impressed, shouting antisemitic taunts. Exercising restraint, he generally ignored them.



Greenberg hit his peak in 1938, hitting 58 home runs. His mother had promised him that if he broke Ruth's record, she would celebrate by making him 61 gefilte fish in the shape of baseballs. It was just as well that he fell short of the mark. "There is no way I could have eaten all that gefilte fish," he said.

But after coming so close to equalling or surpassing Ruth's record, Greenberg negotiated a salary of $40,000 a year, making him the highest-paid player in professional baseball.

After Japan's attack on the U.S. Navy at Pearl Harbor in December 1941, Greenberg became the first active major leaguer to enlist in the armed forces. At officer training school, he shared an apartment with Hollywood actor William Holden.

During the war, Greenberg was stationed in India and China and dispatched on inspection tours of air force bases in Asia. In 1945, he was sent back to the United States to help boost morale in defence plants.

He married well, his wife being the daughter of department store mogul Bernard Gimbel. But the marriage dissolved, and Greenberg became one of America's most notable bachelors. Eventually, he remarried, his new wife having been a B-movie actress.

When he resigned, he turned his talents to management. As general manager of the Cleveland Indians, he earned a reputation as a volatile boss. "I guess I was tough to handle," he admitted. "I played hard, tried my best. I was always trying to overachieve."

In the late 1950s, Greenberg and Bill Veeck bought control of the Chicago White Sox, but the partnership did not last. Quitting baseball for good, he devoted himself to his investments.

Greenberg's son, Steve, played baseball in the minors and later became a deputy commissioner of baseball and a major figure in sports broadcasting.

Although he never visited Israel, Greenberg was a fierce Zionist, regarding the Jewish state as a moral imperative after the Holocaust and donating money to build a tennis centre in Israel.

Until the age of 74, he played tennis six days a week, and in his waning years, he smoked excellent cigars and enjoyed caviar in what his wife said was "obscene amounts."

Diagnosed with kidney cancer, he died in his sleep on Sept. 4, 1986. He was buried in Hillside Memorial Park in Culver City, Calif., the resting place of Jack Benny and Eddie Cantor, among other Jewish celebrities. His headstone was inscribed, "Hank Greenberg, loved and admired by so many," with the image of a menorah carved into the words.

Despite the antisemitic fans and players who hounded him, Greenberg was indeed a beloved figure in baseball.

TORONTO AUTHOR ALISON PICK ON LONG LIST FOR MAN BOOKER PRIZE

Toronto author Alison Pick, who won the prestigious Stan and Helen Vine Canadian Jewish Book Award in May for her novel Far to Go, has been named one of 13 nominees for the 2011 Man Booker Prize.

Pick is one of three Canadian authors (the others are Patrick Dewitt and Esi Edugyan) on the Man Booker long list, which was narrowed down from a field of 138 books under consideration. Pick is one of four first-time novelists on the list.

Far to Go tells a Holocaust story involving members of an affluent, secular Jewish family in Prague who end up in the Auschwitz death camp. It was published by House of Anansi.

Upon receiving the Canadian Jewish Book Award in May, Pick explained that she had been raised as a Christian and found out by accident that her father was Jewish and that her great-grandparents had died at Auschwitz. Although her grandparents came to Canada and began a new life that didn't include Judaism, she decided to convert back to Judaism. "This family secret has informed my entire writing career," she said.

"The writing in Far to Go is clean, crisp and unencumbered," wrote Globe and Mail reviewer Steven Galloway last September. "Pick never dwells for too long on an image or metaphor, and she creates small moments that are both lovely and frightening."

Pick is the latest in a string of Jewish authors to be honoured by the Man Booker jury. Last year's prize went to Howard Jacobson for The Finkler Question, and more recently, Philip Roth was awarded the biennial International Prize over the protests of one jury member who subsequently resigned.

The Man Booker prize can give a novel an astonishing boost in sales, as it did in 2002 for Yann Martel's Life of Pi, which went on to become an international best-seller. Even being named on the long list – and later on the short list of six nominees, if Pick should progress that far – will have a wondrous effect on sales.

Band blends Roma and klezmer music

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

Music is in Paul Mathew's blood.

Mathew, the bandleader of the Gypsy Flame Showband, was inspired to become a musician thanks to his father and grandfather.

"[My father] was a full-time musician, and so was his father," Mathew said. "So I'm the third generation."

Gypsy Flame Showband performs a range of European, Roma and klezmer songs at shows all over the Toronto area.

The band is known for its high-energy show and traditional Roma costumes.

They have two shows planned in the coming months — one at Lula Lounge in downtown Toronto at 7 p.m. on Sept. 11 and another at Vaughan City Playhouse on Oct. 16 at 2 p.m.

"There'll be five people dancing, and one of them also sings," said Mathew. "Two violin players, myself on accordion and a guitar player that sings."

Gypsy Flame Showband

His reason for loving music and performing, which he's been doing for more than 40 years, is simple.

"[I like] making people happy, obviously," he said, adding that people who come to the shows have great reactions to the music.

"They say they enjoyed it very much."

This is because, he surmised, of the strong European feel of the songs.

"People who have come from Europe have seen Gypsy bands, and they remember them from years before.

"They're very popular in Europe and that's why I know there's a market for that and I'm bringing that here," Mathew said.

In the past, the band has performed at various synagogues, Nathan Phillips Square and Mel Lastman Square. For the last five years, they've entertained the crowd at the Cavalcade of Stars at Shaarei Shomayim, an event that raises money for Jews for Judaism.

Mathew, who has played piano since he was seven, is always looking for people from the Roma community to perform with the band.

Tickets for the show at Lula Lounge are $18 in advance and $20 at the door. Tickets for the October show at Vaughan City Playhouse are $25 each.

Fringe playwright's career is gaining 'momentum'

Cara Edell
Special To The CJN

Ron Fromstein, 38, recently won the Toronto Fringe 24 Hour Playwriting Competition.

Toronto-born Fromstein, who has also lived in Vancouver, New Orleans and Chicago, is a five-time winner-finalist of the competition and a three-time winner of the Canadian National Playwriting Award. This year, four of his shows will be performed in seven different fringe festivals across Canada.

"Slowly but surely, each time a show plays somewhere, someone is taking an interest in both that particular play and my writing in general. Someone is telling a friend. Someone is e-mailing me. Someone is Facebooking me. Someone is Facebooking someone else about me. And so, gradually, I'm becoming a mini-franchise," he said.

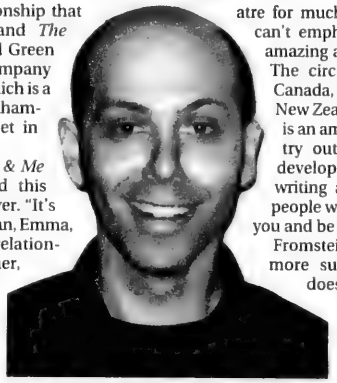
Fromstein has been writing plays for "a while," he said. After winning second place in his high school's playwriting competition, Fromstein continued pursuing his passion and making a name for himself in the industry.

His first non-school competition win was in 2004 for the Toronto Fringe, and in 2006 he was flown to British Columbia to receive another award. "Since then, it's become progressively more serious, and I've non-coincidentally paid more bills and rent."

Fromstein said he began writing scripts because he likes "the simplicity of play structure versus fiction. Writing what people are saying, and not saying to each other, seems to cut to the chase. I get a little impatient writing fiction. But, to be honest, it was to impress a girl originally."

Fromstein's more current plays include The Big Smoke (now playing at the Winnipeg Fringe), which tells the story of a young man in search of himself and his sexuality; Black & Blue (in Hamilton, Ont., earlier this year), which focuses on a relationship that involves assault, and The Three of Us (Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company reading in 2010), which is a retelling of the Abraham-Sarah-Isaac story set in the modern era.

His play Dianne & Me is being performed this summer in Vancouver. "It's about a young woman, Emma, sorting out her relationship with her mother, Dianne, once she [the daughter] becomes pregnant. The pregnancy intensifies the relationship enormously. In fiction as in real life."



Ron Fromstein

Fromstein said he is "growing as a writer and person" and his scripts are reflecting his maturity. He said Dianne & Me has received recognition because "the mother-daughter relationship is inherently dramatic and therefore lends itself to theatre."

The story is told from a teenager's point of view, he said. "I think that in itself is interesting to a lot of people. The play isn't an answer or a remedy to the challenges of the mother-daughter relationship. It's an attempt to join the conversation in a meaningful way. And since it's a conversation many people are already having and will continue to have, it resonates with some people."

Fromstein said he was delighted to see mothers with their daughters at the performance in Hamilton. "I saw a woman pull Kleenex out of her purse and set it on her lap before the play began. In short, I saw and hopefully will continue to see, people being affected in a meaningful way."

Fromstein credits the fringe theatre for much of his success. "I can't emphasize enough how amazing an opportunity it is. The circuit extends across Canada, the U.S, Australia, New Zealand and the U.K. It is an amazing place to both try out new writing and develop already existing writing and meet amazing people who will both inspire you and be inspired by you."

Fromstein said he will feel more successful when he doesn't have to work part-time as a theatre usher for extra income. "In the meantime, it does feel like things are starting to come together."

He said the e-mails from strangers and peers who have enjoyed his writing are very encouraging. "It's nice to know you've affected people in a meaningful way – be that challenging them intellectually or simply offering some meaningful entertainment that distracted them from the stress of their day for a few hours. I think that, in and of itself, is incredibly important to a lot of people."

Fromstein said he hopes the future brings more extended runs.

"The Harold Green Jewish Theatre has been very supportive to me both personally and professionally," he said. "Two theatres in New York have taken an interest in my work, so I'm excited to see where that goes. There seems to be a sense of general momentum and I'm trying to keep that going."

As a Jewish writer, Fromstein says his religion has influenced his work. "It's like saying, does being your parents' child influence you? How can it not? That's a huge part of who I am (both being Jewish and my parents' child). It literally colours everything I do and everything that I am. It's part of the fabric of who I am."

Last year, when he was adapting the Abraham-Sarah story, Fromstein said he rediscovered how strongly it still resonates with him personally and with people in general. "Regardless of where you stand on the religious spectrum, the Torah is an amazing body of stories."

Polish boxer a source of joy, pride to Jews

Uri Talshir
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In 1934, Szapsel (Shabtai) Rotholc was a member of the Polish boxing team that traveled to Budapest ahead of the European Amateur Championships. One year earlier, as Adolf Hitler was rising to power in Germany, Rotholc became the first Jewish boxer to win the Polish championships. And in Hungary, he did what many people had considered impossible: he beat the odds, overcoming all the stigmas and the racial theories to win a bronze medal in the flyweight division.

"An unparalleled Jew," was how Henrik Lazar, the sports editor of the now-defunct Krakow-based Jewish newspaper Nowy Dziennik, praised Rotholc. "At a time when the level of Jewish athletes in Poland is in decline and when we are searching for a competitor whose achievements can serve as a symbol of the strength and prowess of Jewish youths, we have found a source of joy and pride: Rotholc the wonder, the Jewish boxer."

Rotholc, who was born in Warsaw in 1913, was a member of the Gwiazda Warszawa Boxing Club and was the star of Polish sport in the 1930s. Members of the Jewish community saw him as a symbol of the Jew who could defend himself, who fought like a lion before audiences of thousands – including Germans wearing swastikas. Another newspaper heralded his bronze-medal performance in Hungary as "the Jewish David slaying the German Goliath."

In 1935, word of Rotholc's prowess crossed the ocean. He travelled to Chicago for a competition between Polish and American boxers, where he won his country's only medal. A year later, he was voted top Jewish athlete in Poland's sportsman of the year poll of readers of the Przeglad Sportowy newspaper – a feat he repeated the next year.

On March 11, 1938, the Idishe Bilder newspaper ran a front-page headline proclaiming "Our Szapsel, the boxing hero."

All the more remarkable was that Rotholc came to the sport almost by accident. Rotholc was about 17 or 18 when a group of ruffians accosted him and his father in the streets of Warsaw. They started pulling on his father's beard and insulting him. At the time, Rotholc had no boxing experience at all, said his son, Richard Rotholz, who lives in Montreal.

But, "he beat them off. My grandfather turned to him and said [in Yiddish] 'Szapsel it's time for you to learn to box properly.' He joined a club and in the first year was the champion of Warsaw," Rotholz stated.

By the time the Idishe Bilder story appeared, Rotholc's record showed 15 victories in the 16 bouts he fought under the Polish flag.

In 1936, Berlin hosted the Olympic Games. Jewish organizations boycotted the so-called Nazi Games, but Rotholc, who at the time was serving in the Polish army, bowed to pressure from his commanding officers and agreed to participate. While he never actually competed in Berlin, the fact that he agreed to travel to Nazi Germany disappointed his many fans. Richard pointed out that his father had beaten the eventual gold medal winner in a three-round decision before the Games.

On his return, Rotholc was ousted from the Jewish Sports Federation.

Toward the end of the decade, Rotholc fell victim to the growing tide of antisemitism and found himself excluded from training camps and, eventually, from the Polish delegation to the 1939 European Championships.

When the Warsaw Ghetto was established, Rotholc joined the Jewish police. The respect accorded to him by the German and Polish guards enabled him to smuggle goods and money into the ghetto and to ensure his family's survival.

Richard recalled one story his father told him. Caught along with two others outside the ghetto, he was taken to a German police officer. The officer recognized Rotholc and asked him if he remembered him. When his father said he didn't, the German told him he had boxed against him in Breslau before the war. "Don't do this anymore," he warned him. "If I catch you, I won't be able to help you anymore." He then took out his pistol and shot the other two smugglers.

In 1944, after the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, he was transferred to a work camp inside Germany, where he managed to survive the war. His wife was murdered, but Richard was hidden by a Polish Catholic family and also survived.

By agreeing to join the ghetto police, Rotholc tarnished the image that he had built up over the prewar years. He was determined to clear his name, but in 1946 he was put on trial by the Central Committee of Jews in Poland, accused of collaborating with the Nazis. There were contradictory accounts of his behaviour as a police officer: some residents of the ghetto said that he beat them mercilessly, while others told of how he managed to save the head of the Jewish resistance from deportation to a concentration camp.

Szapsel Rotholc

It's a period that clearly still pains Richard, who told the story of his dad hiding a six-year-old girl under his coat who was slated for deportation and taking her to a safe place. The girl joined several others in hiding and survived the war.

"To her, he was a saviour," he said.

On Nov. 29, 1946, Rotholc was expelled from the Jewish community for a period of two years; his civil rights in the community were rescinded for a further three years. During his trial Rotholc enjoyed the support of the Polish Boxing Federation, the former captain of the boxing team and the country's top sports officials, all of whom testified on his behalf.

"At the time, there was a lot of bitterness," Richard said. "In the ghetto, he couldn't save everybody, he saved some lives."

On June 22, 1948, at the end of his period of exclusion, Rotholc was reinstated as a member of the Jewish Sports Federation.

Later that year he was reunited with Richard and emigrated to Montreal, where he remarried and worked as a furrier.

His father never returned to boxing, Richard said. "After the war, he was never the same person. The war tremendously had an affect on him."

He recalls his father as "honest, straight. He was very correct, just a fantastic guy."

Rotholc died in 1996.

Holocaust oratorio to feature some 200 performers

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Zane Zalis, a Winnipeg composer, producer and high school teacher, has written a powerful musical Holocaust oratorio titled I Believe that is scheduled for a full production at Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall on Oct. 25 featuring some 200 performers, including a symphony orchestra and three choirs.

Holocaust survivors who have seen excerpts have commended Zalis for capturing the immediacy and depth of feelings they had experienced during the Shoah. The young man and woman who are the principal characters of I Believe voice their increasing desperation with the utmost simplicity and directness. "Where were you, God?" one character sings. "Why did you hide? I'm all alone. I need you now, God. Please hear me."

Zane Zalis

Zalis, who has a Ukrainian Catholic background, admits that he's been obsessed with the subject since he began writing the work about seven years ago.

"I'm not going to fool myself and say that a piece of music is going to change the world, but if it makes people reflect for a moment about the Holocaust... then I'll have done my job," he told The CJN during a visit to Toronto in June at one of several musical soirees in private homes staged to raise awareness and patron support for the October concert.

> I Believe will debut in Toronto in October

Although he wanted to craft a modernistic suite, he avoided the atonality that is the current trend, he said. "I wanted the melodies to sit on peoples' minds after they had left. You want the message to get into them, you want them to hum something to rekindle those memories." The classicist in him also demanded a symphony orchestra rather than the contemporary style of a rock musical.

A 2009 Winnipeg performance of I Believe with the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra and a subsequent scaled-down performance in Austria both elicited strong audience reaction, the composer said. Some survivors told him he had made them remember their raw feelings as experienced in the camps; one said he had "gotten as close to the barbed wire as it was possible to get without being on the other side."

Zalis said he wanted the piece to tell a story, touch a nerve and be remembered. "I wanted to make it substantial as a composition, with a layer for everybody, so when you listen to it for the second, third or fourth times, you hear different things each time."

The Toronto debut performance of I Believe, A Holocaust Oratorio For Today will feature the Opera Canada Symphony conducted by Roberto Paternostro, music director of the Israel Chamber Orchestra. Principal singers are soprano Kelsey Cowie and tenors Marc Devigne and Marko Zeiler, and the choirs are the Orpheus Choir of Toronto, the University of Toronto MacMillan Singers and the Hamilton Children's Choir.

The concert is being produced by Attila Glatz Concert Productions and is being presented in partnership with the Koffler Centre of the Arts. Thanks to patron subsidies, ticket prices are being kept to a reasonable amount. Tickets are available from Roy Thomson Hall by telephone, 416-872-4255, or from the website www.roythomson.com. You say director. We say Wainsteim

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Mix equal parts fantasy and talent, a heaping spoonful of artistic vision and what do you get? Sean Wainsteim.

The Toronto-based writer and director recently won a Much Music Video Award (MMVA) for Best Director for Canadian rock band You Say Party's video Lonely's Lunch. While thrilled with the win, he's now looking to branch out from short-form film to concentrate on directing feature films.

Wainsteim, who will be 36 on Aug. 22, is the grandson of Holocaust survivors and highlighted his grandparents in a short film called Esther and Leib, which is up for an award for the RBC Emerging Filmmakers Competition as part of the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) in September.

The four-minute short film was both an artistic homage to his grandparents and a directorial challenge, since Wainsteim and his competitors were all required to record their projects using portable high-definition cameras and then edit their work on a minimal budget.

He said his grandparents are like many survivors who came to Canada post-Holocaust. "They jumped borders, took a slow boat to Montreal, and from there came to Toronto."

Working on their story caused him to rethink his methods about how he makes films, he said. Creating "honest" material that resonates both for him and for filmgoers is now his focus.

"I just wanted to do something that felt true and honest to me and shoot and edit the movie as raw and as natural as possible," Wainsteim said. "That's not to say that a movie like Die Hard isn't honest, it totally is. But I hope that the love comes across" in Esther and Leib.

He said that growing up in a close-knit family with survivor grandparents also played a role in shaping his directorial style.

"I grew up listening to horrible stories that kids probably shouldn't hear. But I'm grateful for all my grandparents' dark and true stories. It's probably why I was drawn to the darker fairy tales in my youth," he said. "As a kid I'd sometimes go to bed thinking Nazi storm troopers would come bayonet me in my bed at night. It was terror."

Wainsteim's family is an eclectic mix of nationalities. His mother is French and his father is Brazilian.

"They met in Israel on a kibbutz. So I'm a French-Brazilian Jew," he said, laughing.

He's always known he wanted to create and his experience attending the Ontario College of Art and Design helped solidify his directorial impulses.

Some of the early influences that sparked his imagination include reading J.R.R. Tolkien's Lord of the Rings trilogy of books, listening to Grimm's fairy tales, Alice in Wonderland and the stories of Maurice Sendak.

"I see some of the illustrations in those books now, and it all comes flooding back," Wainsteim said.

He added: "Growing as a kid in the 1980s, man, it all had an impact. From watching The Goonies to Robocop to Return of the Jedi."

While his parents weren't initially thrilled with his career choice, they've since come to understand he can make a living at it and that it makes him happy, he said.

"They'll be reading this in The CJN," he said, laughing. "It took them awhile to 'get it,' and they still wonder what I'm gonna do when I'm older. But for me, if I'm not creating, I'm done. That's it. So I'm happy to keep going."

Wainsteim said he was never drawn to pursue a career where he knew how his professional path would turn out.

"Kind of like the philosophy of [French artist] Marcel Duchamp, who said that if he could visualize something and knew how it would turn out, why bother doing it? Likewise, I was in high school and realized that I could go to university, become a lawyer and know I could do that, but I didn't know if I could be an artist. So I went to art school," he said.

Sean Wainsteim [James Heaslip photos]

He joked that for the first few years of art school he dreamed of building robots "that would chase people" around art galleries.

But after four years, he realized he'd been doing a lot of filmmaking and knew he was now an artist.

The theme to most of his work was always "nostalgic fairy-tale stuff" and inspired by memories of having frequented libraries as a child "and poring through books of illustrations from around the world." He also cites memories of attending puppet shows and children's theatre shows. That is where the "magic" in his work is rooted, Wainsteim said.

Over the years, Wainsteim has worked on numerous projects for many people and won many awards. He eventually started his own boutique animation, effects and design company with some friends.

After co-running that company for a few years, he felt the need to branch out yet again as his life was becoming predictable. That's when he decided he needed to make a serious attempt at being a filmmaker to test his limits and create his own films, not just "client-driven" videos and projects.

"So I took off to Asia for three months, because it was cheaper than therapy," he quipped. "I didn't know whether I'd end up buying a small restaurant in Thailand or what. But I knew I needed a creative recharge, some time to think... to figure out my path."

Now that he's won his MMVA Best Director Award and has received the accolades and attention that come with it, Wainsteim is eager to try and capitalize on this moment.

"I've surrounded myself with like-minded people... who believe in the stuff we're creating without cutting corners, who believe in the process. I want to be making films."

Wainsteim said he hopes to have one or two feature films "under my belt" within the next five years.

He said his first film could be any one of four or five projects currently on the burner.

"It could be anything from a horror-comedy to a kid's fantasy film. I just have to see which one is ready to eat first."

TIFF recently accepted Wainsteim into its Telefilm Canada-sponsored 2011 PitchTHIS! initiative. It's a competition where participants attempt to sell their movie ideas to a jury of industry professionals. The winner gets a $10,000 prize to help develop their film concept as a feature film.

"I'll be pitching the feature version of my fantasy short film Lost for Words," Wainsteim confirmed.

Lost For Words is his "love letter to a time I spent in the library as a child... that led to a lifelong fascination with storytelling and storytellers."

טלי: שיו, איך בא לי תינוק פתאום?

אני: שיו, איך בא לי במבה פתאום?

טלי: מה, את רעבה? אני מזמינה. רוצה קפה קר? קולה? עלי.

אני: שאלת אם אני רעבה אז מה את מציעה לי משקאות? חוץ מזה אני לא קונה את המוד הפזרני שלך. כולה את מתכננת להזמין אותי לאייס קופי בדולר ממקדונלדס. מכירים אותך, לא מאתמול.

טלי: דוקא עמדתי להציע שנתחלק באיזה סלט כייפי, לידיעתך.

אני: מתאים לי, אבל תבקשי שתי צלחות הפעם. אני לא עושה את הטעות הזו של לאכול איתך מאותה צלחת יותר. די. ניכוותי מספיק בחיים.

טלי: סוציומטית פחד את. מה עובר עלייך?

אני: תביני, כשאוכלים סלט, יש אסטרטגיה אינטימית ברורה: קודם גומרים עם החסה המעצבנת, אחר כך עם הירקות המשעממים, ואז, מתחילים ליהנות מחגיגת הטונה הגבינה הביצה והזיתים, ובאמצע לחמים וחמאות.

טלי: נכון, מדוייק, אז?

אני: מה אז. פעם שעברה ירדת על כל הטונה, והשארת לי רק חסות. זה הכל.

טלי: את יודעת מה, לא בא לי כבר על סלט איתך. לא בא לי על כלום. מרוצה? חוץ מזה אני חייבת לשמור. הרי אכלתי בוקר יפה. זה משיעמום. לא חסר לי.

אני: דווקא ניראה לי שרזית לאחרונה, או משהו?

טלי: נכון? כולם אומרים. לא יודעת איך. אני זוללת ללא הפסקה. אבל תודה. ואגב, גם את נראית יופי. מתאים לך רצח התספורת הקצרה.

אני: נכון? כולם אומרים. זה קופץ כזה יפה בקצוות, נורא שובבי כזה.

טל (מתבוננת סביבה): כל הפרומנד הזה ישראלים. נשבעת לך. כל התורן-היל הזה רק ישראלים. לא תמצאי פה משהו אחר.

אני: דווקא מספרים שמצאו בתורן-היל זוג מבוהל של פנסיונרים סינים שנשבעו שהם בכלל לא ישראלים.

טלי: אז מספרים. יללא, סגרנו על סלט?

אני: סגרנו. אבל תבקשי המון רוטב. בשביל המחיר שלהם זו זכותינו. וכך מתנהל לו בוקר שיגרתי של בריחה למזגנים ושיחות נפש. המשך יבוא.

Do Palestinians have Jewish roots?

Yossi Tastassa
Special to The CJN

Tova Raz, an Israeli who has lived in Canada for nearly 25 years, began her professional career as a visual artist. Judaism was the focus of her creations.

But the art chapter in her life peaked 10 years ago. Since then, Raz has been writing.

Her last book, One More Generation, is historical fiction. It raises many philosophical questions about the nature of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and suggests ways to look at it.

"Like many Israelis, I arrived to Canada by coincidence," Raz says. "My husband got a job [offer] from a friend, and the rest is history. My elder daughter was born in Israel, and my younger daughter was born in Canada. The same is true about my identity, half Israeli and half Canadian," she added.

In 1990, though she spent most of her time occupied with her visual art, Raz wrote a children's book, Spots of Imagination, which encourages young children to use their imaginations.

In 2005, Raz wrote My Mother's Unborn Child, a novel about memories of the Holocaust. A year later, she wrote Climbing Down.

In her latest book, Od Dor Echad (One More Generation), the main character is Daniel Zacchay, a scientist and high-tech innovator who uses his time and energy to help the people of Israel who were forced to convert from Judaism to Islam – the Palestinians – return to Judaism.

Tova Raz

Raz is collaborating with Zvi Misinai, a high-tech entrepreneur who has explored the origin of the Palestinians, as well as ways to solve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. Misinai's work inspired Raz and led her to write Od Dor Echad.

Raz points out that many of the Arabs living in Israel observe Jewish customs. Some use a mezuzah and tfillin; others have adopted customs such as hafrashat challah (setting aside a portion of the unbaked challah), brit milah on the eighth day and many more.

During an interview, Raz showed The CJN a short video featuring Arab villages in the West Bank. According to rabbinic and genetic experts who appear in the video, there is no doubt that many of today's Palestinians have Jewish roots.

It took eight months for Raz to write Od Dor Echad. "I was sitting in front of the computer screen eight to 10 hours a day," she says. "The book is not political [and] totally fictional. [The characters] Daniel and Naomi are fruits of my imagination."

A Jewish figure is depicted praying on the front cover of the book. The tfillin are on his left hand and on his head, and the tallit covers his shoulders and back. Sharp eyes will notice that the tallit is actually a traditional Arab keffiyah.

Raz writes in Hebrew but is working on an English version of Od Dor Echad. She also hopes to see an Arab language version published as well.

Od Dor Echad (One More Generation) is available on amazon.com.

Some 300,000 Israelis took to the streets throughout the country last Saturday night to protest social inequalities and the high cost of living. Over the past three weeks, Israelis have set up tent camps in a number of cities and organized protest marches and demonstrations calling attention to the soaring cost of living. The sign held by one of the protesters in Jerusalem, below, reads, "My dear country is expensive for me." Please see related stories on pages 4, 9 and 27.

Israelis take to streets for social justice

JERUSALEM — The Knesset plans to hold a special session to discuss the growing social protests across Israel against the high cost of living there.

At the request of the opposition parties, the Knesset will temporarily break from its summer recess for the session to take place either this week or next Monday.

Hundreds of pensioners staged a protest at the Tel Aviv government compound this past Monday demanding that the government lower medicine costs, cancel the value added tax on basic necessities and prevent a cut in pensions.

Gideon Ben Yisrael, head of the pensioners' union, said his members identify with the nationwide social struggle, but demand specific solutions to their sector's problem.

Shlomo, a pensioner from Ashkelon, said, "The last time I protested was in 1947 against the British... Open your eyes, look at what is happening around you – it's a terrible thing."

Another speaker at the protest said: "The youth and the pensioners will oust [Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu together."

Dozens of non-profit and social organizations were scheduled to hold an emergency conference this week and present their demands.

Giora Rozen, head of the umbrella organization of non-profit groups in Israel, said that "most of the organizations represent the lower strata of society. Therefore, there can't be a solution without dealing with Israel's poor population together with civil society organizations."

Approximately 300,000 people gathered Saturday night in Tel Aviv, 20,000 participated in Jerusalem, 3,000 in Kiryat Shmona, 5,000 in Modi'in, 1,000 in Hod Hasharon and 1,000 in Eilat to protest the rising cost of living. However, those close to Netanyahu said the media inflated the numbers.

This marked the third consecutive week a rally has been held in Tel Aviv, but this latest one was by far the largest.

People marched from Habima Square, near the tent city on Rothschild Boulevard, to the Kirya defence compound on Kaplan Street.

Protesters chanted: "The people demand social justice" and "An entire generation demands a future."

JFS Gets Grant

OTTAWA —Jewish Family Services of Ottawa has received a $50,000 Ontario grant to assist hate crimes victims. JFS and the province said late last month. The grant will train counsellors to help link victims to community resources, the Ottawa Citizen reported. Ottawa-area MPP and Infrastructure Minister Bob Chiarelli said the grant will go a small way toward compensating for the $827,000 that the JFS lost last year when Ottawa cut $44 million in funding to community and immigration agencies.

Giffords OK To Run

TUSCON, Ariz. —Gabrielle Giffords' neurosurgeon says the Arizona congresswoman could run for re-election. Peter Rhee, who operated on Giffords' brain after she was shot in January, told Tucson's NBC affiliate last week that Giffords' mental faculties had fully recovered, but the decision to run "is personal." Speculation about a re-election campaign by Giffords has risen since she appeared on the U.S. House of Representatives floor last week to vote on the debt ceiling deal. Giffords' spokesperson said no decision had been made yet. The deadline to file for re-election is in May. Giffords, a Democrat and the first Jewish woman elected to statewide office in Arizona, would be running for her fourth term.

Motown Seeks Jews

DETROIT — Detroit's Jewish community has launched a nationwide drive to attract 25 young Jews to live in the city. Do It for Detroit is holding events this month by city residents and former residents, as well as supporters in Los Angeles, New York and Chicago, to raise $100,000 to revitalize Detroit's Jewish community. A program of Detroit's Jewish federation, it will offer $3,000-a-year subsidies to live in the city, with recipients hosting at least one event a month to strengthen the Jewish and Detroit communities. The first event was Aug. 3 in suburban Detroit, followed Aug. 4 by one in Chicago. Fundraisers in Los Angeles and New York are planned. The effort is part of a larger one to reverse Detroit's brain drain stemming from a poor local economy.

Pollard Recovering After Surgery

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Jonathan Pollard is recovering after successful surgery.

Esther Pollard, the jailed spy's wife, told the Jerusalem Post Aug. 3 that he was "conscious and aware" for what she had termed as "urgent" surgery having to do with his kidneys and gall bladder, which she said was a "temporary fix."

Jonathan Pollard

Pollard, a U.S. Navy civilian analyst who was sentenced to life in 1987 for spying for Israel, was removed Aug. 2 from a federal prison in Butner, N.C., for the surgery. He has been in poor health, including a deterioration of his kidney problems. Esther Pollard came from Israel to North Carolina to visit him before the surgery.

Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, visited Pollard in prison last week. Pollard urged Oren to seek his release from President Barack Obama. Pollard was not allowed to visit his father on his deathbed or to attend his father's funeral earlier this summer, despite appeals from Israeli officials and supporters. Previous presidents have refused similar requests.

Farmar To Maccabi

NEW YORK — Jordan Farmar of the New Jersey Nets has signed to play for Maccabi Tel Aviv. Farmar, a 6-foot-2 guard who is Jewish, will reportedly play for the Israeli champs as long as the NBA lockout continues. He's eligible to play as an Israeli, so he wouldn't count against the limit of four foreign players per team in the Israeli league. The Los Angeles native averaged 7.4 points and 2.7 assists last season. He played four seasons for the Los Angeles Lakers before signing with New Jersey in 2010.

Promenade marks 25 years

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

In honour of the 25th anniversary of the Promenade Shopping Centre in Thornhill – a home away from home for thousands of Jewish mall rats who live in the area – a special event was held last Thursday to thank both retailers and the customers for their years of support.

Hundreds gathered in the mall's centre court for giveaways, a plaque presentation and a performance-art presentation by Toronto artist Jessica Gorlicky.

Armed with cans of spray paint, Gorlicky took the stage to face her blank white canvas. With a hip hop soundtrack blaring in the background, she turned the blank canvas into a commemorative piece of artwork for the Promenade's silver anniversary within 20 minutes.

In addition to the art presentation, Promenade staff handed out cupcakes to shoppers and provided an arts and crafts station for children to make birthday cards for the mall.

Stretching democracy's sinews

From the editor's desk...

The sight of hundreds of thousands of Israelis from all walks of life marching in the streets is not really remarkable. We have seen that before and quite often. For Israelis are not shy in expressing their opinions. Nor are they reluctant to do so en masse, in very large numbers in city squares or on main street thoroughfares.

The comparison of the "tent city" and other demonstrations in Israel to the recent mass demonstrations in some countries of the Arab world have been quaint, but not really apposite. Nor is there a direct causal connection joining the impressive courage of the demonstrators in the democratically closed streets of the Arab Middle East to the impressive staying power of the various ongoing demonstrations in the democratically wide open streets of Israel. Israelis frequently gather in large numbers to shout their political views at the reigning government of the day or at their political opponents. The Israeli vox populi has no difficulty finding massive, loud, voluble, cacophonic expression.

What has distinguished the mass demonstrations in Israel in recent weeks with those of the past has been their pan-party nature. Rather than right-wingers shouting at left-wingers or pro-settlers yelling at anti-settlers or secular Israelis angry at haredim, the shouters and demonstrators these days are from a wide swath of "middle" Israeli society: young and old, men and women, politically left and politically right, observant and non-observant.

The "tent city" demonstration, mostly by young Israelis protesting the high cost of housing in the heart of upscale Tel Aviv, is the most unconventional and visibly photogenic protest. But hundreds of thousands of Israelis have also taken to the streets in recent days to protest the high cost of cottage cheese, of daycare arrangements, the onerous working conditions for doctors and interns and even the situation of dairy farmers.

The protests are a sustained, broadly based, poignant plea for social justice that resonates across political loyalties, ethnic backgrounds, gender and occupation. As such, they have the potential to profoundly affect if not also change the way politics are done in Israel. The existing party member bases are too narrow to embrace the wide mass of demonstrators. Similarly, the existing party platforms are too self-focused, too tapered toward self-interest to encompass the breadth of social concerns being articulated by the mass of demonstrators.

The politicians will respond. The question is how.

Speaker of the Knesset, Reuven Rivlin, has already said that he believes the protests will force elections earlier than their expected date of November 2013. He well understands that the mass protests represent a new political phenomenon that requires meaningful, substantive response by the parties.

Tent city protesters in Tel Aviv

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu appointed widely respected Prof. Manuel Trajtenberg, the former head of the government's economic advisory council, to head a panel of experts to recommend policies in response to the many valid complaints of the protesters. The members of the Trajtenberg panel have not yet been named.

Netanyahu asked the panel to respond to five issues: "One, a change in priorities, with the goal of easing the economic burdens on Israel's citizens. Two, a change in the mix of tax payments. Three, expanding access to social services. Four, increasing competition and efficiency in the goods and services markets, with the goal of reducing prices. Five, implementing the housing plan we've already launched."

The panel will submit its ideas to the socioeconomic committee of cabinet by the end of September. The committee will accept, reject or revise the panel's recommendations. The prime minister will then tie the entire process together no later than November.

The policy-regulatory-legislative response by the government to the concerns of the protesters must be bona fide. Moreover, the protesters must see that it is. The tents on Rothschild Boulevard in Tel Aviv will soon be packed up. But the causes for which they stand will remain.

The sinews of Israel's democracy are being stretched. It remains to be seen whether they will be sufficiently flexible to embrace, in wisdom and in justice, the protesters' concerns, or whether they will snap, incapable of being other than what they usually are, expedient, ephemeral, window dressing.

ROCKETS FIRED FROM GAZA

Palestinians have resumed firing mortars and rockets at southern Israel. Two Grad rockets were fired from Gaza last Wednesday evening. The first exploded in an open area between Sderot and Kiryat Gat. The second exploded on the edges of Ashkelon. No injuries or damage were reported in either case. Three mortar shells and a Qassam rocket also hit the western Negev. They landed near a kibbutz, damaging a fence. Since the start of 2011, more than 340 rockets have been fired from Gaza. Defence Minister Ehud Barak on Sunday called the escalation of attacks serious and said he believes they will continue and intensify. In the photos, Israeli security experts inspect a small crater formed by one of the Grad rockets.

Camps review security after Norway tragedy

'I think we have a responsibility to be prepared, but also not to overreact'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Could an attack like the one in Norway happen here?

Yes, says Doron Horowitz, director of national security infrastructure for the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), but there are many things that can be done to mitigate a threat to an institution or camp.

"I think we have a responsibility to be prepared, but also not to overreact. We need to be realistic and to ensure that our solutions are workable."

Last week, Horowitz took part in two consecutive conference calls for Jewish camps in the wake of recent events in Norway.

On Aug. 3, the U.S.-based Secure Community Network (SCN) – which is funded by the Jewish Federations of North America – set up a conference call for Jewish summer camp officials with a U.S. Homeland Security Department official. Horowitz is a senior adviser to the SCN. Most of the 77 people killed in Norway died in a shooting attack at a youth camp on the island of Utoya.

Horowitz also conducted a conference call with at least four participants from Jewish summer camps in British Columbia, at the request of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver.

The Norway tragedy brings to light "very specific lessons" with respect to managing emergencies, Horowitz told The CJN.

Camps tend to have a more open and relaxed environment, he said.

Jeff Rose, director of Camp George, said his camp has "shored up" its security and reviewed protocol with staff since the Norway attacks.

Another director of a Jewish camp declined to be quoted at all, and a third did not respond to a request for comments.

Having an emergency management plan – for everything from allergic reactions to water safety to dealing with "individuals with ill intent" – is important, Horowitz said. It should encompass everything from training staff to technology and having good relationships with local law enforcement and emergency responders, he added.

Having in place procedures such as lockdown and evacuation in the event of an armed intruder are part of an emergency plan.

In his role at CIJA, Horowitz liaises with federal and local law enforcement, and serves as a resource for the Jewish community nationally.

In Canada, as in Norway, a peaceful society can "foster individuals that go under the radar screen," Horowitz said. Norway gunman Anders Behring Breivik has claimed responsibility for the attacks but he has also pleaded not guilty, saying the killings were justified.

A Homeland Security official, who spoke to wire service JTA on condition of not being named, said that telltale signs of a possible attack in the works include "an individual becoming increasingly vocal and visible in their... rhetoric."

The official identified patterns of behaviour around synagogues and other Jewish community buildings that merit reporting to the authorities: "multiple instances of appearances" by a stranger "in an entrance or exit area, parked cars in places that are unusual... an individual trying to monitor activities, maybe photographing security personnel, photographing the building in a way that doesn't seem typical of someone who's interested in architecture."

Visit to France reconnects Toronto cousins

Ellin Bessner
Special to The CJN

The grave of Canadian bombardier George Meltz lies in the peaceful Reviers cemetery, located just south of Juno Beach, at Courseulles-sur-Mer, where the Toronto soldier landed along with 14,000 Canadian troops on June 6, 1944.

Meltz's tombstone bears a poignant inscription that attracted my attention during a visit to that cemetery while I was touring D-Day landing sites on holiday in France.

It reads, "He died so Jewry shall suffer no more."

We were moved, because the D-Day landings helped bring an end to the Holocaust.

The only information we could find in the cemetery were two lines in a government folder at the front gate. It identified him as George Meltz, 25, of Toronto, who died July 8, 1944, and named his parents and his widow, a British war bride.

We took photos of Meltz's grave and of the inscription, and I decided to hunt down any of his family to send them the pictures of his final resting place.

An Internet search turned up a few more details, such as how he died: "Of his wounds," according to the Canadian Jewish Congress archives published in 1948.

It also named a street address in Toronto, and a brother, Jack Meltz, of 210 Montrose Ave.

Eventually, I found a listing for a George Meltz, a real estate professional in my own neighbourhood in Richmond Hill, Ont. Also, a George Meltz used to be president of my synagogue, Beit Rayim, also in Richmond Hill.

These coincidences were uncanny.

So I called.

A very surprised Meltz told me that yes, indeed, the man buried in France was his uncle.

"I was named for him," Meltz explained.

I broke out in goose bumps.

The real estate agent had never been to the grave in France and didn't know about the tombstone inscription.

He was able to add some new details to the story of the man we discovered in France.

"He was the youngest, the last of the 10 [children]," Meltz said. "He was the only one that went [to war]."

He had indeed married a British girl, as thousands of Canadian servicemen did during the war, but Meltz said no one knows what happened to the widow.

Military historians say Meltz's Royal Canadian Artillery Regiment, the 3rd Anti Tank Regiment, was likely either manning a six-pound anti-tank gun or an M10 converted Sherman tank, with two guns on it.

"My dad told me he was picked off by a sniper," Meltz said.

Approximately 5,500 Canadian casualties from D-Day and its aftermath are buried in two large cemeteries in the area. In Meltz's Beny-sur-Mer cemetery, as it is officially known, there are about a dozen Jewish servicemen's graves.

I sent Meltz my photos of his uncle's tombstone with the poignant inscription that sparked my transatlantic search.

He appreciated seeing where his ancestor is buried, even if "seeing your own name on a tombstone is really spooky."

Sadly, for Meltz in Richmond Hill, with none of the dead soldier's other siblings still alive, he thought there was no one left to ask about his namesake's wartime exploits.

But Meltz won't have to remain in the dark about his famous uncle any longer.

I was telling my story to a cousin, Judy Guttman, a Toronto elementary school teacher, who revealed that she has a friend named Isabella Meltz. Could it be?

A quick telephone call confirmed that the soldier was indeed, also her uncle.

As for the George Meltz of Richmond Hill?

He's her first cousin, who she said has lost touch with the family and who she hasn't seen in many years. Their fathers were George's brothers, Sam and Jack, known as Yaacov.

"Maybe we'll get back with George [because of this]," said Isabel, who works in a community legal clinic in Toronto.

She could show him her late uncle's official wartime military service record, some photos of him in uniform, and one with his young English wife. She also kept a treasured handkerchief that the solider sent back home to his brothers from training in England before D-Day in 1944.

It says, "To my brothers, Good Luck."

"He was the youngest, they must have been just heartbroken," Isabel said, although she remembers the family didn't talk about it while she was growing up.

Grave of George Meltz

"By the time you want to ask them, it's too late – they're all gone," she said.

The family doesn't know who approved the prophetic epitaph on her uncle's tombstone, although she thinks it could have been his widow, a Trudy Lewis, of London.

The phrase was so gripping that Canadian military historian and author Eric McGeer featured it in his 2008 book Words of Valediction and Remembrance: Canadian Epitaphs of the Second World War.

Intrigued now, Isabel plans to write to the Commonwealth War Graves Commission to find out about the mysterious epitaph.

She herself has photos of the original wooden Star of David that marked the grave for more than 60 years, until it was replaced by the newer marble slab erected after 2008, when the Canadian government began restoring all the crumbling markers in that cemetery.

Although she herself has never been to visit, for the last few years she has been lighting a yarhzeit candle for her uncle.

"There's no one else [to do it for him]," she said.

The administrator of Beit Rayim Synagogue, Fran Isaacs, says that when she heard about the amazing connections, "I got goose bumps, too."

She plans to publish a story about the Meltz connection in the next synagogue bulletin, due out this fall.

Ontario missing out on Israeli start-ups: scientist

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

An expert on the Canadian-Israeli medical sciences sector thinks Ontario needs to do more to attract Israeli start-ups.

Morry Blumenfeld

Earlier this year, Morry Blumenfeld hosted a Canadian delegation of diplomats and businesspeople at his home in Israel to extol the virtues of Israeli technology and promote joint business ventures between the two countries.

Blumenfeld, an expat Torontonian who recently made aliyah to Israel, has a PhD in molecular physics from the University of Toronto. Now retired, he spent 35 years as an employee of General Electric, the last four of which he spent as the company's managing director for GE Medical Systems Israel.

In May, representatives from York Region, York University and the law firm Miller Thomson, along with a delegation of Markham councillors and business leaders attended the Israel Life Science Industry Biomed conference in Tel Aviv.

While there, many of them also met with Blumenfeld to hear his ideas on how best to commercialize Israeli technologies in Canada.

Blumenfeld, who was in Toronto late last month to meet with Markham Mayor Frank Scarpitti and tour the Markham Convergence Centre – a small business and medical sciences incubator – said his message to Scarpitti, and Canada was to start engaging with Israeli start-ups and make more use of Israeli innovations.

"Israel has the highest densities of start-ups in the world," he said. "Each year, Israeli transfers of [technologies and patents] generate a total of 1 billion shekels in royalties, and 150 new technologies are licensed every year in Israel."

Blumenfeld is also on the board of Hebrew University's Yissum Research Development Company, the school's technology transfer company.

He said that three of the Top 10 universities receiving European Research Council grants are from Israel: Hebrew University, the Technion and the Weizmann Institute.

Despite ongoing efforts by Canadian politicians to generate more business with Israel, Blumenfeld said that the Israeli life-science sector's understanding of Canada is "poor."

"Ontario should do a marketing study on how to attract Israeli start-ups" to the province, he said.

He added: "It's tough to find partners in Ontario."

Scarpitti has said he envisions establishing a partnership between the Markham Convergence Centre and Israel.

In 2010, Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty went on a trade mission to Israel, during which he visited Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, and West Bank cities of Ramallah and Bethlehem. The trip was focused primarily on Israel's life-sciences sector.

Arab world worried

The slaughter in Syria continued unabated over the weekend. The grisly arithmetic of Syrians murdered in cold blood at the hands of their own ruler is becoming too much even for some of the Syrian dictator's Arab League allies. One by one, it seems, they are starting to express in public their ever-growing disquiet over Bashar Assad's shameless depredation of his own people.

Media reported that at least 80 more people were killed Sunday by the Syrian army in the cities of Deir al-Zour and Homs. According to international observers, this brings to more than 1,650 the number of Syrians killed since March by the Syrian army protesting the anti-democratic policies of their strongman ruler.

King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia announced on Sunday that he would recall his kingdom's ambassador from Syria for "consultations." Short of severing bilateral ties, in the nuanced, double-entendre world of international diplomacy, the Saudi ruler's announcement was a severe rebuke of the Syrian president. Abdullah made his point quite forcefully. "What is taking place in Syria is unacceptable. The killing machine and bloodshed must be stopped."

Clearly, from the language of the rebuke, the Saudis have lost patience with the Alawite regime in Damascus and more likely, with the regime's sponsors in Tehran. In this regard, the Saudi king was merely echoing the words of the head of the Arab League Nabil al-Arabi. One month ago, during a visit to Damascus, al-Arabi attributed the spiralling bloodshed in Syria to "foreign interference" in Syrian affairs. He could only have been referring to Iran whose financial support essentially props up the Syrian regime.

On Sunday Al-Arabi too, urged Assad to "immediately halt" the violence against his own people. "The Syrian government and national powers should take all necessary steps to provide a favorable climate for serious engagement in a comprehensive national dialogue," he said.

The high-profile criticisms of Syria by the Saudi king and by the Arab League came merely days after the condemnation by the United Nations Security Council of the Syrian brutality. The text of the condemnatory resolution read, in part: "The Security Council calls on the Syrian authorities to fully respect human rights and to comply with their obligations under applicable international law. Those responsible for the violence should be held accountable."

The resolution could not have passed the council without the express consent of the Arab League power brokers to the five permanent veto-wielding members of the council. To be sure, some members of the Arab League are shamed by Syria's sadism. But let us not be fooled. They are more likely worried by the alarming signs of increasing manipulation and control of Syria by the meddlesome mullahs in Tehran.

Supporting terrorists 'enlightened'

In response to "Is antisemitism rising in Canada's north" (July 7), I would sadly have to agree with your unnamed source in Yellowknife. I have lived in Yellowknife on and off for more than 20 years and am not at all pleased with recent developments. There is growing antisemitism here, weakly wrapped in the guise of pro-Palestinian activism.

As was stated in the article, there is a very minimal Jewish presence in the north, which leaves the pro-Israel position unspoken and unrepresented. Yellowknife has a transient population and attracts people from across the country, particularly the young. Far too many have been seduced by the "progressive" inclination to identify with a perceived underdog, without an understanding of the larger issues or historical record, as there seems not to be a serious counterweight to this in most of the mainstream media. A growing percentage of our population seems to be accepting this as a consensus. To disagree is to be radical and out of the local mainstream.

Your article came less than two weeks after an incident involving my wife and I. While having dinner at a local restaurant, we were discussing the preparations for the second Gaza flotilla, as well as an article reporting on a potentially large oil discovery in Israel. Another patron had been eavesdropping, came to our table and began hurling abuse. We were called racists and Nazis, as well as several other all-too-predictable slurs. My wife was mortified and very upset. The fact a complete stranger felt justified in verbally abusing people having a private discussion does not bode well. It seems that to support Israel in the north is becoming synonymous with racism, while lending support (moral or otherwise) to terrorists is enlightened and progressive. I can understand why the woman quoted in the article chose to remain unnamed.

Remembering Sbarro terrorist attack

Ten years ago, eight-year-old Tamara Shimashvili was shopping with her mother, Lily, in Jerusalem's Bell Shopping Centre, where I had an optical centre at the time. The young girl asked her mom if they could go next door to Sbarro for pizza. Shortly afterward, I heard the sadly familiar blast of a pigua, a terrorist attack, and, tragically, both were killed in the explosion. Aug 9, 2011, which fell approximately on Tisha b'Av, was the 10th anniversary of the horrific Sbarro attack, and while we will be soon remembering the victims of 9-11, it is important to recall the Sbarro victims as well. They are: Giora Balash, 60, from São Paulo, Brazil; Zvika Golombek, 26, Karmiel, Israel; Shoshana Yehudit (Judy) Greenbaum, 31, Passaic, N.J.; Tehila Maoz, 18, Jerusalem; Frieda Mendelsohn, 62, Jerusalem; Michal Raziel, 16, Ramot, Jerusalem; Malka Chana (Malki) Roth, 15, Ramot, Jerusalem; Mordechai Schijveschuurder, 43, Neria, Matte Binyamin; Tzira Schijveschuurder, 41, from Neria; Ra'aya Schijveschuurder, 14, from Neria; Avraham Yitzhak Schijveschuurder, 4, Neria; Hemda Schijveschuurder, 2, Neria; Lily Shimashvili, 33, Jerusalem; Tamara Shimashvili, 8, Jerusalem; Yocheved Shoshan, 10, Jerusalem.

The number of days Hamas has held Gilad Schalit captive

UN recognition of 'Palestine'

As the Palestinian Authority gears itself for an application to the United Nations in September to recognize "Palestine" as a sovereign state, it is essential that Israel emphasize and stress the fact that such a state would have as a component Hamas, an internationally recognized terrorist organization. In their charters, Hamas and the Palestine Liberation Organization still call for the destruction of Israel. It would be ludicrous for the UN to admit as a member state a country overtly committed to the destruction of another state. Israel knows that in any issue before the UN, it faces bias and prejudice, but nonetheless, hopefully, right-thinking countries will recognize the perversity of admitting a government made up of Hamas as a member state.

Protesters seek return to welfare state

Leslie Susser
JTA

The wave of protests sweeping Israel is about much more than the lack of affordable housing: it's a grassroots demand for the major redistribution of the nation's wealth.

In social terms, protesters are calling for a more caring government attuned to the needs of young, middle-class citizens who serve in the army, pay heavy taxes and provide the engine driving the country's burgeoning economy.

In economic terms, it's a call for the reversal of nearly three decades of fiscal conservativism at the expense of social services such as education, health and welfare, as well as an appeal against eroding salaries and rising prices.

In other words, the protesters are demanding that today's thriving free-market Israel use its wealth to create conditions for a restoration of at least some elements of the long-defunct Israeli welfare state.

As an estimated 150,000 people demonstrated Saturday night in 12 locations across the country, the central theme was a demand for "social justice." To some, it was reminiscent of the students' revolt in Paris in the late 1960s: an alliance of students, workers and, in the Israeli case, a large, financially strapped middle class of people, mostly in their 20s and 30s, demanding a new economic order.

But there were key differences: in the Israeli case, there was no violence. Instead, there was a veiled, largely unspoken threat: if the government fails to act and middle-class people continue to struggle to make ends meet, many more of the best and brightest will leave for countries where there is no defence burden and it's easier to make a living.

As the protests entered their third week, the great Israeli paradox loomed large. Never has the country been economically stronger, yet never have so many of its young people felt so frustrated at their own personal financial status.

The current situation is partly a result of a constitutional lacuna.

In the mid-1990s, a number of basic laws were passed – together they are eventually meant to form the basis of a constitution for Israel. One of the laws – on the dignity and freedom of man – enshrined property rights, but a balancing companion act on social rights continues to be held up. It would deal with issues like the right to housing, education, health and welfare, and set parameters of state responsibility for their provision.

The bill is again on the agenda, promoted by Meretz Knesset member Zahava Gal-On.

But the country's current socio-economic predicament goes much deeper than any law. It's the result of more than two decades of a virtually consistent small government economic policy.

The turning point came in 1985, with inflation running at over 450 per cent per annum. It became clear that Israel could no longer afford to maintain the old-style, government-subsidized welfare state.

The economic stability plan introduced by then-prime minister Shimon Peres and then-finance minister Yitzhak Modai entailed stringent cuts in government spending. With its dramatic success in saving the economy, the small government approach quickly became economic orthodoxy.

The economic buzzword in the 1990s was privatization, started by the Likud, taken on board by Labor and then accelerated by Benjamin Netanyahu. When he first became prime minister in 1996, Netanyahu spoke of a thin man, the private sector, tottering under the weight of a fat man, the public sector, and vowed to turn things around. Netanyahu had a strong ideological commitment to free market forces, privatizing government companies and outsourcing social services.

This meant the accelerated handover of services to the private sector that once were the sole preserve of government. It was accompanied by a weakening of trade unions and an overall erosion of working conditions and salaries.

The result? Owners and a select few mega-salaried executives became richer and the middle class relatively poorer. It also led to the rise of the Israeli tycoons, who controlled a great deal of the country's wealth and power. Banks, energy companies, supermarket chains and media properties all were concentrated in the hands of a dozen or so billionaire families.

Netanyahu's economic philosophy also entailed a reduction of corporate taxes. Big companies paid five per cent to 20 per cent income tax, while the middle class saw the prices of everything from food to cars to apartments rise considerably. The system produced impressive economic growth but left wealth in the hands of the few. The trickle-down effect, middle-class Israelis said, had failed to materialize.

The upshot was that by May 2010, Israel's economy was robust enough for Israel to be admitted to the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development – the exclusive club of the world's strongest economies known as the OECD. But Israel was also the OECD member with the biggest gaps between rich and poor.

Some blame preferential spending on settlements in the West Bank for the lack of funds for social services in Israel. Others focus on welfare for the growing haredi population in Israel. Still others point to the limited taxation of the tycoons – tax concessions nationwide are estimated at approximately $11 billion per year, about 11 per cent of the national budget.

For years, middle-class discontent simmered under the surface, always eclipsed by security concerns or peacemaking moves. For embattled Israel, peace and security inevitably took top priority.

Until now. With terrorism virtually non-existent and the peace process deadlocked, young Israelis have turned their attention toward generating a mass movement against the socio-economic system.

Their anti-establishment energy took the form of street protests because there is a strong sense that none of the traditional parties represents their interests, and Israel has a long history of street protests, encompassing everything from Ethiopian immigration to the campaign to release captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

For the most part, the protests have not been focused. But now the leaders of the protest movement are formulating a list of concrete demands and general principles for change. These are expected to include demands for public housing on a large scale; major tax reforms that would increase taxation of the super-rich and lower indirect taxes on the general public; a shift in budgetary priorities, transferring part of the defence budget and the increased tax money from the rich to fund social services; and demands for Israel to comply with OECD averages when it comes to the numbers of doctors, policemen and firemen per 1,000 citizens, and the number of children in classrooms.

Netanyahu has set up committees to examine all the relevant economic issues and to negotiate with the protesters, who are likely to be backed by trade union boss Ofer Eini. The prime minister almost certainly will produce a new economic plan, but it may not be enough. What the people are demanding is a new social contract.

The political question is whether this could have an impact on the next election, scheduled for 2013, and the agenda over which it will be fought. That depends on how pressing security issues are around that time and whether these protesters can sustain enough momentum to translate their street movement into real political power.

Voices from the past, voices in the present

Whether the personal or the historical, versions of the past go in and out of fashion. Like it or not, we cannot help but look backwards through the eyes of the present. More often than not, we wish to know not simply (and sometimes not even) what actually happened, but what that means to us, decades, centuries or millennia later.

As Jews, we relate to our festivals and commemorative days this way. Over time, these special dates acquire an accretion of (sometimes contradictory) meanings connected with – but not identical with – the original set of events that anchored them on our calendar. The commemoration of Tisha b'Av, just past us, is a good illustration of this phenomenon. By now, it has come to stand for a string of Jewish catastrophes, for the abstract idea of destruction, for Jewish continuity despite devastation. For many of us today, it is impossible to read some of the verses of Eichah/Lamentations without thinking uncannily of the Shoah. For others, the existence of the State of Israel ameliorates the bite of Tisha b'Av.

Our always evolving relationship with the past helps explain the neglect or rediscovery of writers. For example, the now celebrated fiction writers Aharon Appelfeld and Ida Fink both struggled initially to publish their works. Appelfeld, who came to pre-state Israel as a young adolescent, after surviving the war wandering alone in the forests of eastern Europe, was advised not to squander his writerly talents on the European past but instead to engage with the dynamics of a young, dynamic country. Ida Fink, who survived the war posing as a Polish labourer and reached Israel in the late 1950s, was told repeatedly that her stories about life and death during the Shoah were not dramatic enough, that her voice was too quiet for her subject. By now, however, both writers have published to great critical acclaim. Appelfeld's massive oeuvre is read as reflecting not only on the European past but also on the Israeli present. Fink's quiet voice is recognized for its subtlety and insight.

A striking example of our shifting relationship with the past and with writers who reflect on the past is the case of Hans Keilson, who passed away less than three months ago at the age of 102. Like Otto Frank, Anne's father, Keilson was a German Jew who left Germany for Holland soon after Hitler came to power. Sheltered in the home of a Dutch couple after Germany occupied the Netherlands, Keilson, a physician, remained active in the Resistance. Under the protection of false papers identifying him as a German, non-Jewish doctor, he visited hidden children who were separated from their parents, essentially to comfort them and help them negotiate the attendant stress.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

While in hiding, he began writing a novel about the effects of Nazism on Jews. It was completed after the war and published in 1959 in German, and in English translation three years later. English language reviewers liked The Death of the Adversary, but neither German nor Israeli reviewers liked the novel. He also completed a novella, Comedy in a Minor Key, about a Jewish man hidden by a Dutch couple, published in German only, in 1947 – the year that Anne Frank's famous diary was published. Both Keilson's works fell into obscurity.

A few years ago, a translator stumbled upon an old copy of the novella in a bargain book bin. Mesmerized by it, he contacted Keilson, then in his late nineties, for permission to translate it into English. Already a centenarian by the time of publication, Keilson lived to see both works garner accolades, and a reading public ready – in the way it was not half a century ago – to appreciate his psychological acuity and acerbic humour as a means of reflecting on the Shoah.

The relationship between present and past is something organic, akin to a coral formation. Later events build upon the structure of earlier ones, keeping the entire enterprise alive. If the past is alive for us and in us, we don't so much preserve the past as integrate it into our broader perspective. What we recollect helps us to understand what we experience and observe right now, and what we understand of the now leads us to recalibrate and reassess the way we see the past.

The enigma of Jewish identity

Alan Montefiore is a scion of a distinguished Jewish family with deep roots in British society. His grandfather, Claude, wrote important books on Judaism and was one of the founders of the more radical (liberal) wing of British Reform. His father, Leonard, was a prominent member of the West London Synagogue, the cradle of Reform Judaism in the British Isles.

One of Leonard Montefiore's many contributions to Anglo-Jewry was to be among the founders and funders of the Leo Baeck College, which for over the last half-century has trained rabbis for the Progressive movements in Britain and abroad.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

His son is a philosopher. Alan Montefiore's most recent book, A Philosophical Retrospective (Columbia University Press), is an attempt to describe, if not define, his Jewish identity in the language of his academic discipline by combining abstract thought with autobiography and family history. Philosophers are likely to read the references to the author's life as illustrations of the universal questions about identity as they relate to fact and value. Ordinary Jews may read them as attempts to explain the enigma of Jewish particularity in universal terms.

The author isn't the only Jew in Britain or elsewhere to be puzzled by being Jewish. Even a Polish Jew who lived and worked in England for many years, the late Isaac Deutscher, whose many books include a biography of Trotsky, another marginal yet clearly identifiable Jew, struggled with his background.

Deutscher, a scion of a haredi family, properly rejecting the notion of a Jewish race, asked: "But if it is not race, what is it that makes me a Jew? Religion? I am an atheist. Jewish nationalism? I am an internationalist." And answered: "In neither sense am I, therefore, a Jew. I am, however, a Jew by force of my unconditional solidarity with the persecuted and exterminated." He described himself as a "non-Jewish Jew."

Though nothing positive seemed to claim Deutscher's loyalty as a Jew, the Shoah compelled him to identify with his forebears, and perhaps what they stood for, because they had perished. I've known many Holocaust survivors who shared Deutscher's Judaism.

But they're more likely to have quoted the late Toronto philosopher Emil Fackenheim. He said something similar, albeit in affirmative terms, when he declared that by their very survival, Jews deny Hitler a posthumous victory. But unlike Deutscher and other Jewish intellectuals, Fackenheim saw in Israel the ultimate proof of Jewish survival. His disciples sometimes chose to understand this to include identification with Israeli right-wing politics.

Even though neither Alan Montefiore nor his family were exposed to Nazi atrocities, he's by no means indifferent to what happened to the Jewish people in those years. As the joint president of the Wiener Library in London - one of the most significant institutions that preserve the historic evidence of the Holocaust – he's well aware of the effect of the Shoah on contemporary Jewry. I also recall visiting with him a Nazi concentration camp and the great impact it had on him.

But the primary Jewish references in A Philosophical Retrospective are to the author's family and its history, particularly to his grandfather, who died in 1938, when it was still possible for "an English gentleman of the Jewish persuasion" to oppose Zionism, as he did, and to insist that the only way to affirm the universal values of Judaism is through belief in One God.

Although it's not clear how the grandson views Israel and God, he does tell us that already his father had abandoned the pre-World-War-II anti-Zionist stance of his father. And Alan Montefiore acknowledges approvingly the secular Judaism that's being shaped in Israel today.

Irrespective of how he understands and defines his Jewish identity, he's a Jew by birth and, therefore, accepted as a Jew by every stream in Judaism. The fact that he's prepared to use his biography as the subject of philosophical discourse suggests that being Jewish is no longer something one has to be quiet about, whether or not one practises Judaism.

In consequence, many non-Jews are nowadays attracted to Judaism. Some embrace it and become Jews by choice. Descendants of Jews who once hid their origins are rediscovering their roots. They're Jews "by surprise." As Jewish identity has become more varied, it has become even more complex and enigmatic, and thus a very suitable subject for philosophic investigation.

A giant in Holocaust studies

Inconceivable as it sounds today, the formidable Israeli historian Yehuda Bauer was once the sole scholar in Israel teaching Holocaust studies at the university level.

"Many people didn't take it seriously as a topic," said Bauer, recalling the era of the 1950s and 1960s. "It was not recognized as a legitimate topic of inquiry, though books on the Holocaust were published in Israel during its early years. It was considered a journalistic topic. The academic community in Israel needed time to recognize it as a serious topic."

Bauer – who had written his PhD thesis on the British mandate in Palestine and who had taught courses on the history of Zionism – turned his talents to researching the Holocaust in 1961.

This was the year the show trial of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann took place in Jerusalem and the year Raul Hilberg's seminal book, The Destruction of the European Jews, was published.

But for Bauer, 85, whose family immigrated to Palestine from Prague on the eve of World War II, a man named Abba Kovner was the tipping point.

A Holocaust survivor, partisan fighter in Nazi-occupied Vilna and Hebrew poet and writer in Israel, Kovner convinced Bauer to focus on the Holocaust rather than on the yishuv, the Jewish community in Palestine.

"He told me I was wasting my time," said Bauer, who was then a member of Kibbutz Shoval, an outpost in the northern Negev Desert where he lived for 41 years until 1993. "I took his advice."

Having decided to specialize in the Holocaust, Bauer, a Hebrew University faculty member, blazed a path that others would follow.

For years, he was the only academic in Israel teaching Holocaust studies, though, as he hastened to add, Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, always employed historians who had survived Nazi persecution and oppression.

Bauer's colleague, Israel Gutman, a survivior from Poland who arrived in Palestine shortly after World War II, was the second Israeli academic after him to specialize in the Holocaust.

To the best of his knowledge, Israeli universities currently employ 20 to 30 such specialists, many of whom teach post-graduate students.

"You need to acquire a discipline, say in history, before you can concentrate on a topic like the Holocaust," he explained.

I interviewed Bauer at his home

Sheldon Kirshner

in Jerusalem

in Pisgat Ze'ev, a neighbourhood-cum settlement in northeastern Jerusalem built on land annexed by Israel in the aftermath of the Six Day War. Despite his dovish views, he has lived there for the past seven years. He claims that the Palestinian Authority has implicitly recognized Pisgat Ze'ev as Israeli territory. All politics aside, the panoramic view from his balcony of the Judean Desert is nothing short of mesmerizing.

Bauer believes the calibre of Israeli Holocaust specialists is second to none. As he observed, "We in Israel are perceived to be in the first line, though we are not the only ones. The United States, Germany, Poland and Britain are among the leaders in Holocaust studies."

Canada lags behind, he noted. But Bauer paid tribute to such "outstanding" Canadian historians as Michael Marrus and Irving Abella, who have both written important books.

Now an adviser to Yad Vashem and a lecturer at its International School for Holocaust Studies, Bauer resigned from the Hebrew University in 1996 after a 35-year career.

"But I carried on voluntarily for another seven years," said Bauer, the founding editor of the Journal for Holocaust and Genocide Studies and a member of the editorial board of the Encyclopedia of the Holocaust.

These days, he advises Yad Vashem on content issues, delivers lectures to politicians, diplomats and army officers and is generally available for consultations.

As an author, Bauer has written about every conceivable aspect of the Holocaust, having delved into the lives of perpetrators, bystanders and victims.

Bauer's latest work, The Death of the Shtetl (Yale University Press), concerns the destruction of predominantly Jewish villages in eastern Poland in 1941 and 1942. By his estimate, approximately one-quarter of the six million victims of the Holocaust came from these localities.

Bauer's previous works include From Diplomacy to Resistance, The Holocaust in Historical Perspective, The Jewish Emergence from Powerlessness, Jews for Sale: Nazi-Jewish Negotiations 1933-1945 and Rethinking the Holocaust.

There are essentially two schools of thought in Holocaust historiography, but Bauer is neither a functionalist nor an intentionalist. Intentionalists claim that the Nazi leadership, from the outset, intended to exterminate the Jews of Europe. Functionalists counter that the Nazis, while deeply antisemitic, took advantage of wartime events to kill Jews en masse.

Bauer, having blended both theories into his analysis, said, "No serious historian today identifies exclusively with one school or the other. That's passé. In a way, the Nazi intention all along was to murder Jews. But the Nazis had no master plan. The Holocaust was not pre-planned. It was rooted in opportunity."

Rather than describing the Holocaust as unique, he prefers to call it unprecedented. "There are parallels and differences between the Holocaust and other genocides," he said. "But there are elements of totality and universality in the Holocaust not found anywhere else."

In his view, Adolf Hitler was absolutely central in Germany's unprecedented extermination scheme. "I don't think anyone else in the Nazi regime but Hitler would have sanctioned the Holocaust. The personality of Hitler is very important."

SS chieftain Heinrich Himmler, in a memorandum to Hitler on May 25, 1940, rejected "the Bolshevik method of physical annihilation of a people" as "un-German and impossible" and recommended the resettlement of Jews on the tropical island of Madagascar. "But by then, there was a movement toward a genocidal solution to the so-called Jewish Question," said Bauer.

He disagrees with the notion, propagated by American historian Daniel Goldhagen, that the "eliminationalist" antisemitic culture of the Germans spawned the Holocaust. "He simply doesn't know German history. Most Germans before Hitler opposed racism and supported social democracy and liberalism. There was less antisemitism in Germany than in Poland and Romania, but he's right to say that by the 1940s most Germans supported Hitler's anti-Jewish policy."

Calling the 1943 Warsaw Ghetto Uprising the first rebellion in German-occupied Europe, Bauer rejects the idea that Jews went to the slaughter like sheep. "The Jews had no leadership, no organization, no arms, and the surrounding population was usually hostile."

A veteran of the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, he regrets that politicians in Israel, particularly the late Menachem Begin, have used the Holocaust to advance political agendas. "I'm against clichés in political speeches," he said in a reference to this practice. "They cause me physical pain."

UN ploy could spark third intifadah: expert

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Palestinian Authority's plan to have the UN General Assembly vote on its unilateral declaration of independence this September could spark a third intifadah.

Prof. Asher Susser, a senior fellow at Tel Aviv University's Moshe Dayan Center for Middle East Studies, made the comment to The CJN while on a media tour in Toronto last week.

He said the Palestinian Authority (PA) plans to orchestrate "peaceful" demonstrations a few days in advance of the vote, but it now worries these gatherings could turn violent and ignite another regional conflict with Israel.

Asher Susser

"The resolution itself will not pass at the UN Security Council because the U.S. will veto it," Susser said. "But the fear is it will cause a lot of disappointment on the ground in the West Bank and Gaza, because nothing will change" for the Palestinian people.

The PA, sensing it may have overplayed its hand at the UN and oversold the merits of its declaration to its own people, fears a chain of events that will backfire on it, Susser said.

"If demonstrations get out of hand, it could lead to something like a third intifadah without the intent of the PA to spark one. And this would put economic aid and western support of the Palestinians on the line. Neither side really wants this," he said.

Susser believes the only outcome possible from the PA's UN gambit will be an "escalation of tension" between Israel and the Palestinians.

If there is an upside, he said, it's that the September vote could create a "crisis situation" in which both Israel and the PA are forced back to the negotiating table.

However, Susser does not agree with the way both sides have chosen to address peace talks thus far.

He believes that the "all-or-nothing" approach to peacemaking isn't viable.

"I don't think it's the wisest tactic for either side to negotiate their narratives," he said, referencing Israel's permanent demand for the Palestinians to recognize it as the Jewish homeland and the Palestinian's unwavering demand for the right of return.

Neither side will ever acquiesce to those conditions, as it would mean forsaking core beliefs.

"The Jews and the Palestinians should not ask each other to undress from their narratives," he said.

Instead, Susser said both sides should focus on interim peace agreements that will "last for the foreseeable future."

"[Israel] needs to rethink what we're negotiating about and what we're trying to achieve. We have to make some hard decisions. We may need a less-than-perfect solution for where we live," he said. "This means territorial compromise for less-than-peace. Leaving things just as they are is not working for Israel. It's time for Israel and [the Diaspora] to think outside the box. The time has come for a grand debate about where Israel should go for the next 60 years."

Speaking of Israel's "neighbourhood" in the Middle East, Susser said the area is about to get a lot more hostile due to the fallout from the so-called "Arab Spring."

While secular liberals may have ignited the Arab Spring in Egypt, those well-intentioned protestors "opened the door to more Islamism," he said.

The result will likely be the ascension to power of the Muslim Brotherhood in that country, Susser predicted.

"Secularism in the Arab world is in decline and retreat. [Israel's] peace treaties with Jordan and Egypt will hold, but they will be cooler," he said.

Despite the more hostile nature of the countries around it, Israel is unlikely to be thrown into war because it still maintains a deterrence advantage over its neighbours, he said.

Since Israel's 2009 war in Gaza, Hamas has not been interested in another round of conflict with Israel, nor has Hezbollah since the Second Lebanon War, Susser said.

All the peace treaties signed with Israel by its Arab neighbours have been done because Israel has been able to maintain its military advantage, Susser said. Beyond that, Israel is now "at the pinnacle of its economic success."

This allows Israel to deter its enemies from attacking it, despite a more virulent Islamist environment emerging in the region.

While organizations such as Hamas may always ideologically believe in the destruction of the Jewish state, they won't act on this impulse because it's not pragmatic to do so, Susser said.

The Arab Spring is a result of great socio-economic and political disappointment in much of the Arab world, where prior governments have failed to give their citizens a better standard of living, he said.

"Hamas and Hezbollah are capable of making rational, political decisions. Once elected, Islamist governments – like a potential Muslim Brotherhood government in Egypt – will have to govern and deliver. They will have to keep their ideological aspirations on hold and keep the peace. But it rests with Israel to maintain its power advantage," he said.

Hadassah rebrands itself

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Canadian Hadassah WIZO (CHW) is rebranding itself in order to clear up any confusion the public may have about the organization, says Alina Ianson, the organization's executive director.

"We're not the same organization as Hadassah [in the United States], and we're not the same as World WIZO.

"In 1917, Canadian Hadassah was established as a Canadian organization, and coincidentally, it had the same name [Hadassah]. Later on, we affiliated ourselves with World WIZO, and added that to our name. We are also affiliated with Hadassah International in New York."

Alina Ianson, Marla Dan

The "two-minute elevator speech" about CHW, she said, is that it is a volunteer women's organization that provides material and moral support to enhance the lives of women, children and youth in Israel through its health-care, education and social services projects."

They decided to portray this mandate, she said, by packaging the name together into a concise manner. "We support children, health care and women, thus we have rebranded ourselves to be CHW: Children, Health Care, Women. [This gives us] one look, and one voice."

Ianson, who has been in her position for 2-1/2 years, said the rebranding was initiated in 2006, as a result of feedback by members and the community at large. "They just weren't sure what the organization was all about."

Many people did not know about the multitude of projects CHW supports in Israel, she said, including CHW Hadassim Children and Youth Village, HW Nahalal Youth Village and CHW daycares.

It also supports a number of health-care projects such as CHW fertility unit at Hadassah Hospital and the CHW M. Fanny Comprehensive Breast Care Institute at Assaf Harofeh Medical Center.

Women's projects include CHW Calgary Bat-Yam Women's Centre, CHW Rose Kanee Community Centre, a national parenting hotline and women's shelters.

"As you can see, there are a lot of projects, and the organization's leaders recognized that we had to streamline our presentation to the public. We needed to give a better message about what we do in Israel."

She said that Marla Dan, CHW national president, has been promoting the rebranding in all centres across the country.

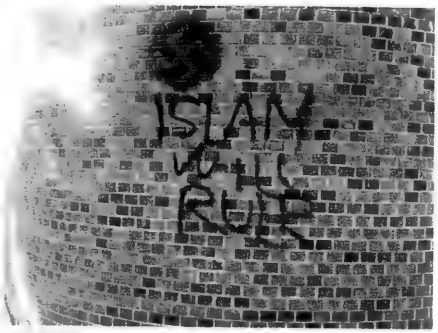
Toronto shul vandalized

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter



The discovery last Thursday of antisemitic, pro-Islamist graffiti on the outside wall of the Robbins Hebrew Academy on Bayview Avenue isn't cause for alarm, Rabbi Jarrod Grover says.

The rabbi, spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, which houses the Hebrew day school – now closed for the summer – said a red-and-black stenciled swastika and the words "Islam will rule" were discovered by a facilities manager who immediately informed senior synagogue staff.

"I notified the police and then wrote a letter to the congregants. My priority was to assure parents that there is no reason for panic," Rabbi Grover said.

"It is repulsive that there are people out there who have so much hate that they need to spray-paint it [on a wall.] We live in a world where people are ignorant and feel the need to take it out in this way. This is not the Canada I know, I love and I grew up in."

"The wider message we have to send is that this vandalism is unacceptable and we need to continue learning about antisemitism and the Holocaust," he added. "Then, maybe some good will comes of this."

Anita Bromberg, national director of legal affairs of B'nai Birth Canada, said B'nai Birth was informed of two other incidents last week involving stenciled swastikas: one at a townhouse complex at Avenue Road and Roselawn Avenue, and a second at a Korean church with a school attached not far from Beth Tikvah.

"The only disconnect is that the words 'Islam will rule' only appeared at Beth Tikvah. We can't tell yet where the stencils were obtained."

She said police have categorized the vandalism at Beth Tikvah as a hate crime, but had no leads as of late last week.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), said in a statement that Beth Tikvah contacted CIJA for assistance in responding to the incident.

"Our primary concern is for the safety of Beth Tikvah, its staff, and congregants. We have been in close contact with police to ensure that immediate measures are being enacted to strengthen Beth Tikvah's security, as well as Jewish community institutions in general.

"We will remain vigilant in the wake of this disturbing and offensive event. Earlier this week, CIJA issued greetings to our friends in Canada's Muslim community on the occasion of Ramadan. We know that this outrageous act will be condemned by Canadian Muslims and members of all faith communities who share our commitment to security, peace, and respect for all faiths."

In a message on Twitter, Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty said he was saddened by the vandalism at the synagogue. "[There is] no place in Ontario for intolerance and hatred. In this we stand together."

Mall in heart of Thornhill

The Promenade has been a big part of the Vaughan community over the past 25 years, and our celebration is intended to thank them for their continued loyalty," Eva Murrant, the mall's general manager, said in a statement.

Given the mall's location, in the heart of Thornhill, home to one of Canada's largest Jewish communities, a number of Jewish organizations, including Jewish Family & Child and Kol Torah Sephardic Congregation, rent space in its third-floor office area.

The Promenade is also home to an Aroma Espresso Bar, an Israeli coffee chain, and the first-ever Yogen Fruz, a frozen yogurt chain that was founded in 1986 by Aaron and Michael Serruya, two Jewish brothers from Thornhill, that has since expanded internationally.

Promenade staff also saw the celebration as an opportunity to give back to the community by partnering with the Vaughan Food Bank to help raise awareness and gather food for the needy. Shoppers are encouraged to bring non-perishable goods to the guest services desk at the main entrance until the end of September.

Jason Alexander to launch UJA Campaign 2012 at Sony Centre

The man behind Seinfeld's George Costanza in Toronto on August 23

By Daniel Horowitz

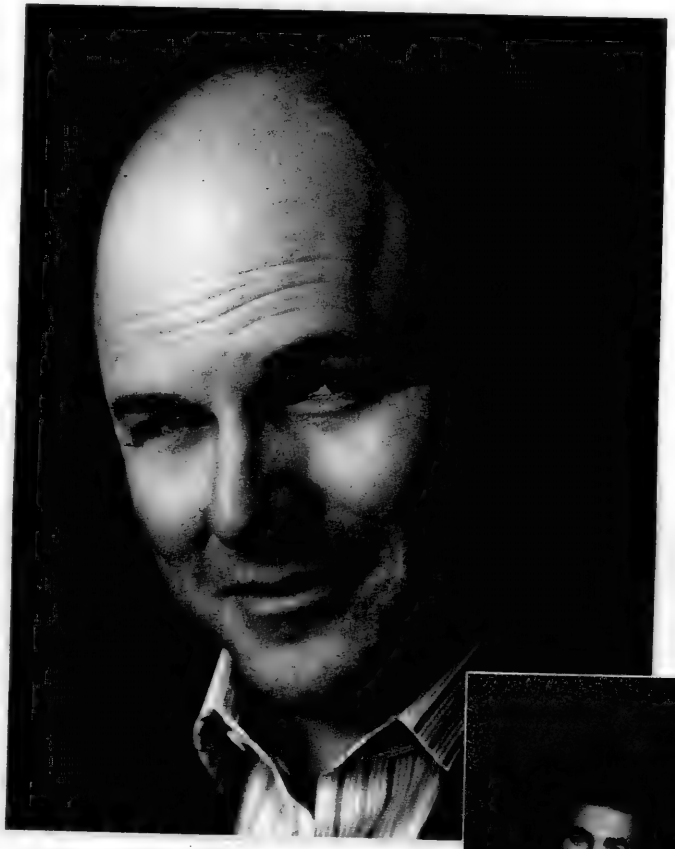
On Tuesday, August 23, the man you knew and loved during his nine year stint as George Costanza on NBC's Seinfeld, will bring his unique and hysterical comedic insights to the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) stage.

The featured speaker at UJA's upcoming community launch of its Campaign 2012 at Toronto's Sony Centre at 7:30 pm, Jason Alexander portrayed the unforgettably neurotic Costanza from 1989 to 1998.

Whether it was the infamous Penske File episode, or when George attacked an unsuspecting mourner at a funeral for "double-dipping," Alexander's personification of insecurity, paranoia, and other neuroses, as well as his unique quips and one-liners quickly became—and remain still—a part of our lexicon.

The role of George Costanza was an actor's dream, especially having the opportunity to work with such a talented ensemble cast week after week. And, in an interview with The CelebrityCafe.com, Alexander was asked if being remembered as George, and not Jason, would bother him.

"Oh, um, one percent," Alexander said. "You know, this is the clarion cry of every actor that's ever done, or that's ever played a famous role. But at the end of the day, no, it doesn't truly bother me, The things that I prefer, when I walk through hotels, when they yell out "George!", I try not to stop, because so many times, people have been actually calling somebody named 'George'! So, uh, I've been embarrassed a few times too many, ha ha! I do think that if you're going to yell out to me in a hotel, know my name, you know? You'll probably get a much better answer from me that way. But no, I have no delusions that on my final day on this planet, IF the news cares to recognize it, they will say "George Costanza has left the mortal coil today."



Jason Alexander

UJA's Campaign 2012 – chaired by Gilbert Palter and Barbara Bank – is focused on four essential areas:

- Social justice (tzedakah) for all
- Education in aid of the Jewish identity so important for our future
- A clear, unified voice in the face of anti-Semitism and racism
- Standing up for, and with, Israel

Elliotte Friedman of Hockey Night in Canada

During his performance at the Sony Centre, Alexander, who recently dropped around 30 pounds as Jenny Craig's newest celebrity spokesman, will be interviewed in a one-on-one interview with another Seinfeld fan, Toronto's own, Elliotte Friedman of Hockey Night in Canada fame.

Known more for pucks and a stick, than yuks and shtick, the 41-year old Friedman jumped at the chance to moderate the interview with Alexander.

"I think you have to renounce your Jewish identity if you didn't like Seinfeld," says Friedman, tongue firmly planted in cheek. "I still watch the repeats on television and my wife has the entire series on DVD. One of my closest friends looks a bit like Jason, and is frighteningly similar to the George Costanza character, too."

Friedman, who has visited Israel several times, and whose youngest sister, Erica, lives in Tel Aviv with her husband and two children, has a strong sense of identity when it comes to the Jewish state.

"I've always believed in a strong Israel," says Friedman whose maternal grandparents were Holocaust survivors. "Things have changed a lot in the past 20 years; Israel's lost a lot of support in the world. Things aren't easy when you're surrounded by people who root for your failure – or worse."

And, for a man used to discussing forechecking, goaltending and penalty-killing, and interviewing the likes of former Maple Leaf Doug Gilmour, does Friedman worry about being out of his element with Alexander?

Not a chance.

"The similarity between interviewing Doug Gilmour and Jason Alexander is that people want to learn about them; it's not about you," says Friedman. "So, your job is really to put them in the best possible position to come off well. A lot of it is research. If you're not well prepared, it can suck the life out of your guest. I assume I'll speak briefly to him the night of the interview, too, and get a better idea of what he likes to talk about and what he doesn't. And, at the end of the day, you want people to leave the event saying, 'I was entertained and I learned something interesting I didn't know before.' This will be an audience that loved Seinfeld. What can we tell them they didn't already know? What stories can we reveal that will make them laugh?"

Between Friedman's second-to-none, laid back and informative interview talents and Alexander's treasure trove of comedic, behind the scene comedic insights, chances are that there will be plenty to make even the most knowledgeable Seinfeld fanatic laugh.

This definitely promises to be a "show about something."

Tu b'Av and women in white dresses

With Tisha b'Av over, we leave the saddest part of the calendar behind and turn to one of the most joyous – and least known – holidays, Tu b'Av. The 15th of Av – which falls this year on Aug. 15 – may not have the fame of Passover or Chanukah but listen to what the Mishnah says about it: "There were no greater holidays for Israel than Tu b'Av and Yom Kippur, for on them the girls of Jerusalem used to go out in borrowed white dresses... and dance in the vineyards. What would they say? Young man, lift up your eyes and see what you choose for yourself." [http://bit.ly/tubav1]

Tu b'Av was the traditional day for courting. These days, you don't see many girls of Jerusalem borrowing white dresses and dancing in the vineyards. Modern boosters say the day should be rekindled as a day in which Jewish men and women search for their shidduch.

According to the Talmud, there are six reasons Tu b'Av was made a holiday. [http://bit.ly/tubav2] Among them: Marriage between different tribes of Israel was finally permitted on that day. In the desert, a ban on inter-tribal marriage had insured that land would not pass out of the hands of the tribe it originally belonged to. Virtual Jerusalem explains the significance. "The ability for all of the tribes to marry each other – necessary to facilitate a deep, fundamental sense of Jewish oneness – is worth celebrating." [http://bit.ly/tubav3]

Yosef Abramowitz and Susan Silverman suggest that we could learn a great deal from those ancient courting practices. "The young girls borrowed white dresses so that the young men could not choose among them according to materialistic concerns... Today, we live in a world that is status- and fashion-conscious, a world of beauty pageants and beauty ideals set by television and movies, and some synagogues are even described as 'meat markets' for looking over the 'unmarried merchandise.' Tu b'Av tells us to look beneath the surface when looking for – or at – a life partner, just as Yom Kippur forces us to look deep into ourselves before God grants us life anew." [http://bit.ly/tubav4]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Rabbi Yossi Sarid says: "Yom Kippur is the day of unbounded love toward HaShem, through self-sacrifice and affliction of the soul, ceding all our physical needs, in accordance with the commandment of the day. This love that is based on giving ourselves totally to God is the essence of Yom HaKippurim... Tu b'Av is the day of love between man and wife, the love that brings to perfection." [http://bit.ly/tubav5]

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach says Jews should repossess "our own, Jewish day of love: Tu b'Av." How? "Well, you could send your special someone a heart-shaped gefilte fish – well-refrigerated, of course. Or FedEx him or her a steaming hot bowl of chicken soup symbolizing your passion. But a far better way is for you women to don gorgeous white sundresses and organize with friends to dance away in Central Park in front of a mesmerized gathering of available single men. When the cops come to arrest you, you can say that your rabbi made you do it." [http://bit.ly/tubav6]

My link to the three weeks of mourning

As a teenager, I spent my summers at overnight camps, on a teen Israel experience, and working at a day camp. Each year, the three-week period connecting the breaching of the walls of Jerusalem commemorated on the 17th of Tammuz, and its ultimate destruction, commemorated on ninth of Av, carried a similar message. Through organized programs at camp, the reading of Megilat Eicha (Lamentations) and fasting, we recounted themes of ancient destruction, exile from the Land of Israel and the cataclysmic impact of these events on the course of Jewish history. While I went through the actions, my sorrow then was often perfunctory.

Class Act

Daniel Held

During university, I spent a summer volunteering with the Jewish community of Buenos Aires. On the 17th of Tammuz, I went to synagogue expecting similar tropes to those at home, but was surprised to find a deeper, more personal and emotionally attached sorrow. That year, the close of the 17th of Tammuz coincided with the anniversary of the AMIA bombing.

Before going to Argentina, I hardly recognized the word AMIA. I knew little about the attack on the Buenos Aires Jewish community centre that killed 85 people in 1994. It was a topic hardly mentioned in my Jewish education.

Following Ma'ariv, I left the synagogue with a group of youths. We spent much of the night on the street outside the rebuilt and newly fortified AMIA complex. In the cold of the Buenos Aires winter, leaders of the city's youth movements came together for a vigil and a memorial. These university-aged students had been in their early teens at the time of the terrorist attack. Many had lost friends in the bombing, which took place during winter vacation – a time when children played in the gym or swimming pool at AMIA – and each could recall precisely where he was at the time of the attack. The group shared stories, memories and tears. They remembered friends and relatives, lit candles and sang songs. The group disbanded well past midnight.

Early the next morning, we returned to the street outside AMIA for a communal rally. The street was blocked off and crowded with thousands of people. The ongoing investigation into the bombing has been marred by incompetence, corruption and conspiracy. The anguish in the speakers' voices was fuelled not only by the terror wrought by the attack, but also by the betrayal of justice in the years following.

The juxtaposition of the three weeks of mourning in Jerusalem and the commemoration of the AMIA bombing was powerful for me, infusing new meaning into a period of traditional sorrow. What had once been three weeks of restrictions resulting in cursory mourning interrupting an otherwise enjoyable summer became a period of greater reflection as I recalled the experience of my Argentine friends.

Our communal gaze is often so fixed eastward that we inadvertently overlook the Jewish experience in other corners of the world. In many ways, my relationship with Israel, like my personal connection to the three weeks, is informed by my sense of peoplehood and my connection to Jewish communities and their experiences and histories around the world.

AEPi readies for upcoming year

Every year, the Ottawa chapter of the Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity strives to help the Jewish community, and this year is no different. Although it's only August, AEPi has set some ambitious goals for the upcoming year, and members have already started planning.

They plan to kick off the year with a club night at the popular Tila Tequila nightclub on Sept. 9.

"It's important for us to have a big party to start the year. It lets everybody know we're back and plan on having another big year," said chapter vice-president Ayal Sadeh. Tickets are $5 before the event and higher at the door.

This night is strictly for fun, but Sadeh assured me that this year won't only be about fun.

"Just like in past years, we will also put a lot of effort into philanthropic events to help the community," he said.

AEPi Ottawa has already planned a few such events, including one on Nov. 4 in the Carleton University atrium when it will team up with Hillel and the OneMatch Stem Cell and Marrow Network to register potential donors.

AEPi has co-sponsored this event on campuses across Canada before and it's always been successful. It has been responsible for finding countless matches and saving many lives.

"This is a really important event for us," Sadeh said. "It allows us to get the community working toward an important cause. It's an especially easy way to get everyone involved, because all we're asking is for a time commitment. There is no monetary commitment."

On Campus

Justin Dahan

He urges everyone to come out. "There is no better feeling than knowing you may have just saved somebody's life."

There are a few other events that AEPi Ottawa likes to be involved with annually, including a blood drive in which members donate blood together – another way the chapter helps to save lives. Members also volunteer every year at the University of Ottawa Heart Institute Telethon, where they help take phone donations, as well as assist with setup and cleanup.

AEPi is always looking for new members. "Joining AEPi was the best decision of my university career, because it helped me connect to the Jewish community on a campus where we have sparse representation," says Tobiah Abramson, the chapter's director of recruitment. "It was not only a great way to make friends, but it was also fantastic to be part of the community and keep my Jewish self engaged," he said.

If you're interested in joining AEPi Ottawa or learning more about it, e-mail the chapter at rushaepinukappa@gmail.com.

Even Moses needed a vacation

There's never a dull moment in a rabbi's life.

Once, while driving with my family across the Canadian-American border, a border agent asked me what my job was, to which I replied, "I'm a rabbi." When asked the purpose of my trip, I said we were going on vacation to which he replied: "Rabbis take vacations? I never saw my priest take a vacation." This comment caused me to ponder rabbis taking vacations...

When Yitro, Moses' father-in-law, came to visit, he saw Moses working from morning to evening. Yitro said to him, "The thing that you do is not good. You will surely become worn out – you as well as this people that is with you – for this matter is too hard for you" (Exodus 17-18). Yitro suggested that Moses appoint others to take some of the workload, thereby freeing Moses to decide the most difficult matters.

Yitro's advice promoted efficiency, understanding that a person needs time for himself in order to re-charge his batteries, so to speak – time to pause and to pay attention to family life. Stepping back to look at "the big picture" usually benefits everyone.

This got me thinking: I'm no Moses, but rabbis, too, need to step back from time to time in order to consider their lives and put things in proper perspective.

Recently, my wife and I decided to take our whole family camping for the first time.

Going camping with a large family is no easy task.

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

It takes a lot of organization, and attention to detail is crucial. Many of our friends told us it would be fun, but not to expect much sleep. On top of all of this, we were cautioned about the possibility of encountering bears or other wild animals. Nevertheless, my wife, skilled in many things, is an excellent trip planner.

We prepared for the big day, and off we went. Happily, things went very well. We experienced new things, to the excitement of the children, and, moreover, we slept very well, waking up to the sound of singing songbirds and beautiful sunrises. It gave us a chance to relax, to re-energize ourselves, to enjoy our wonderful family, and to consider new ideas with renewed enthusiasm.

This trip increased my appreciation of all of the blessings that I have. It made me realize how fortunate I am to have a wife who is so dedicated to her family and gives so much of herself to everyone.

This year we are celebrating our 15th wedding anniversary. I still remember the day we got married – the happiest day of my life! I also remember wondering what married life would be like, what my wife was expecting from me, and whether I would be a good father among other things.

My wife and I have been able, with God's help, to build a healthy, strong Jewish home in which we enable one another to raise our beautiful children and to serve our community – and we are grateful.

May we all take time to refine our perspectives, helping us to maximize our potential and that of our families, friends and communities.

Students see human cost of Mideast conflict in Sderot

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Students from North America recently spent a day giving back to the community of Sderot during a two-week Hasbara Fellows trip to Israel to educate and train them to become pro-Israel advocates.

Sderot has been plagued emotionally, psychologically and economically by rocket attacks from neighbouring Gaza.

Carleton University student Hashem Hamdy, the citywide president for the Israel Awareness Committee in Ottawa, visited Israel for his first time on the Hasbara Fellows trip in June with 43 students.

Hamdy, who is not Jewish but is involved in the pro-Israel movement on campus in defence of the Jewish state's democratic values, said that he was grateful to have travelled to Israel to learn more about the complexities of the region, "which you can't really understand unless you see it with your own eyes."

He said some of the activities on the itinerary "were very politically charged.

"We heard from both sides of the perspective. We heard from Gush Shalom, a non-partisan Israeli peace movement, and from the Israeli Coalition Against House Demolitions, but we also heard from JPost journalists, we went to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, we went to the Knesset," Hamdy said. But it was the time the group spent in Sderot that gave the students a better idea of the human cost of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

During a city tour led by the Sderot Media Center, the students visited the police station where hundreds of Qassam rocket shells are stored as well as a local playground where concrete mazes doubled as bomb shelters.

"Even though there wasn't a red colour alert while we were there, seeing a bomb shelter every hundred metres is really kind of surreal," Hamdy said.

"It was always in the back of your head. When we stopped for lunch, [the guide] said, 'There is a bunker across the street in the playground, there is one next to us at the bus station – you guys try and see if you can run there in 15 seconds.' Imagine thinking like that every day," he said.

"They're economically trapped there because the property values are so low, no one wants to buy their houses and they can't physically afford to leave."

In addition to a city tour and a briefing on the situation facing Sderot residents on a daily basis, the group of students also took time out of their day to volunteer at the food distribution centre, which provides packages of fresh produce for more than 600 needy families.

This food distribution centre gives them an opportunity to eat properly in an economically depressed area," Hamdy said.

Concordia University student Ehle Shachter, who was on a Hasbara Fellows trip from May 22 to June 7, was inspired to initiate a campaign to collect money from the trip participants for new carts for the Sderot residents to use to pick up their packages.

Shachter said she noticed the carts and bags were tattered and worn.

"My tour guide and I came up with the idea together and he thought it was a great idea, especially in a town that is so poor… I felt that we should really be doing something especially while we were in Israel. Everyone was really generous, and we raised more than $1,000." The money was enough to purchase 30 new carts.

Shachter's initiative didn't end with her group. Following her group's lead, Hamdy's group also raised money to buy carts for the families that rely on the food distribution centre. Shachter, who said she now has a much better understanding of the challenges facing the people of Sderot, wants to use this knowledge to spread the word about their plight.

She said she hopes that through her position with the Hasbara Fellowship she'll be able to organize campus events to raise awareness of the situation in Sderot.

Is liberal democracy in Egypt a pipe dream?

The media, among others, seem to have been surprised by the overwhelming show of power by Islamists during demonstrations in Cairo's Tahrir Square on July 29. The Washington Post's reporters, for instance, called it "a stunning show of force that left the liberal pioneers of Egypt's revolution reeling."

These reporters, Leila Fadel and Ernesto Londono, described the scene: "[A]s the Islamists poured into Tahrir, liberal and secular Egyptians were shocked by the tone and intensity of the slogans. 'The people want Islamic law,' the crowds of sweat-drenched Salafists chanted under the punishing sun."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In short order, Fadel and Londono expressed their bewilderment (as did many other journalists covering these events): "Although the vast majority of Egyptians are Muslim, the number who support implementation of strict Islamic law has long been a mystery because hard-line religious communities were persecuted and harassed by [former president Hosni] Mubarak's intelligence service."

There should, however, have been no mystery or surprise at all. Empirical data collected in polls over many years have clearly shown that a substantial majority of Egyptians do not share the liberal aspirations of the reformers. Indeed, the presence of those very reformers in Tahrir Square earlier this year had a significant, but misleading, impact on many in the West who apparently have projected their own hopes for liberal democracy onto the country as a whole.

Gallup, in a 2008 in-depth survey of attitudes in Muslim-dominant countries, found that in Egypt (along with majorities in Jordan, Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Bangladesh) 70 per cent of men and 62 per cent of women want sharia not as a source, but rather as the only source of law.

John Esposito and Dalia Mogahe, whose book Who Speaks for Islam? is based on the Gallup research in 35 predominantly Muslim nations, wrote that, in general, "while acknowledging and admiring many aspects of western democracy, those surveyed do not favour wholesale adoption of western models of democracy. Many appear to want their own democratic model that incorporates sharia, and not one that is simply dependent on western values. Actually, few respondents associate 'adopting western values' with Muslim political and economic progress."

Egypt, as it turns out, falls in the most conservative category of those rejecting western notions of liberal democracy. While a majority of Egyptians say they want democracy and accountable government, what they mean by "democracy" (apparently a reference to free, multi-party elections) is not how the West ordinarily interprets the concept (elections plus guarantees of individual freedoms and minority rights, etc.)

For instance, according to the PEW Research Center's survey (published in April 2011), only about one-third of Egyptians say that gender equality and religious freedom for Copts and other minorities are very important.

Another PEW survey (published in December 2010) found that "[a]t least three-quarters of Muslims in Egypt and Pakistan" favour the imposition of sharia punishments, including the death penalty for those who leave the Muslim religion.

While many analysts argue that Egypt is very unlikely in the years ahead to become an Iranian-style theocracy, the religiously conservative nature of its society of 85 million (90 per cent of whom are Muslim) needs to be recognized and understood for what it is. These analysts also note that the Muslim Brotherhood and more radical Islamists such as the Salafists could end up with as many as 50 per cent of the seats in November's parliamentary elections and constitute the largest bloc. Liberal, secular forces are a distinct minority and not well organized politically.

In the meantime, the Egyptian army remains in control and may not yield power, or most of it, to a civilian authority – even after elections. Unfortunately, the army has harassed and arrested Arab journalists and, according to the July 30 Economist magazine, has doled out harsh jail sentences in military courts to 10,000 civilians since the "revolution," many of them liberal reformers.

In short, there is no basis to the belief – or hope – that Egypt will become a liberal democracy in the foreseeable future.

Recent drownings cause concern among lifeguards

Compiled by CJN Staff

Since May, some 29 people have drowned in Ontario waters. While this number is lower than this time last year, any number is high enough to cause concern among lifeguards and aquatics staff at Toronto pools. The fact that many of the drowning victims were not children, but adults and teens, is especially disconcerting.

"Swimming is a critical life skill. Most people would acknowledge that teaching children to swim is essential, but once these same children hit their teens or early adulthood, participation in lessons or other organized water activities drops," says Naomi Bancroft, aquatics manager at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. Bancroft says that while there are often wait lists for children's swimming lessons at the centre, few teens sign up for the more advanced lessons.

It takes only seconds for a person to drown – and it's often silent. Quoting research on drowning by the Red Cross and the Lifesaving Society, Bancroft says, "Drowning doesn't look like drowning. Typically, we see movies and TV shows that depict people splashing, shouting and flailing. More accurately, people slip under the water quickly and quietly. You don't notice they're gone until you look for them."

Bancroft stressed the importance of lessons in staying safe in the water: "Many of the drowning victims this summer were non-swimmers who ventured into the water or rode on a watercraft while not wearing a life-jacket. Swimming lessons, coupled with water safety knowledge, may help to reduce the number of drownings in Ontario waters. Everyone working in water safety in Ontario is saddened by the recent tragedies. We're all committed to working towards their prevention."

Other tips Bancroft shared include:

Listen to advisories or warnings from lifeguards at swimming pools or other supervised bodies of water. If possible, swim only in supervised areas with regular lifeguard patrols.

Never go swimming alone. Always stay with a buddy.

Always wear a life-jacket on boats or other watercraft – and never drink and boat.

Swimming lessons aren't just for kids – if you're a teen or adult non-swimmer, it's never too late to enrol in a class.

Never leave children unattended around water – even if they have taken lessons.

The Miles Nadal JCC follows the Canadian Red Cross swim-lesson criteria (considered one of the pre-eminent curriculums) and also offers opportunities for people to continue to enjoy the water and improve their skills through ongoing recreational swims, lane swimming and a Masters Swim Club. "Enjoying the water safely should be a lifelong experience. Lessons aren't just for kids," says Bancroft.

100-year-old keeps himself looking good

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Morris Weisdorf, who turned 100 on July 15, looks in the mirror every time he leaves his apartment.

"I make sure my tie is straight, my hair is neat and my glasses aren't cracked. It's important to look right, even to go downstairs for lunch. At my age, too many people let themselves go," said Weisdorf, who lives in the Terraces of Baycrest.

Born in Poland into a family of eight children, Weisdorf came to Canada in 1936 to get married.

"My father had a brother here, and he arranged for me to come over."

He and his wife, Jennie – she died in 1986 – had three children, eight grandchildren and eight great-grandchildren.

Weisdorf said he came to Canada "on a Thursday, and the next day found an ad in the Yiddish newspaper for a tailor. I learned how to be a tailor in Poland, so I went to the store and started working right away.

"I liked Canada because my money was worth more than in Poland. In Poland, we went hungry. When I started working though, I sent my family money. I did my best, and now I'm getting paid back. My own family visits me every day."

His entire family, except for one brother, died in the war, he said. "I found him through the newspaper in 1960. I brought him over, and he still visits me every week."

Weisdorf said he continued working as a tailor, and went on to design patterns for suits and pants at Tip Top Tailors. "I remember I had my interview on the fifth floor. Then I worked for Morris Custom Tailors. When I had an extra dollar in my pocket, I joined Beth Emeth [Bais Yehuda Synagogue].

> 'At my age, too many people let themselves go'

"I knew everyone at shul. Whenever I went they would come over and shake my hand. It made me feel good. My family made me a kiddush on my birthday, and I was called [to the Torah]."

He has "simple" secrets for living to 100, he said. "Don't drink too much, don't run around, keep yourself in shape and respect people.

"I don't feel any different than I did at 99. I'm happy because I have my kids. They give me everything I need. I can't complain."

'Babs' Asper was 'driving force' in community

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ruth "Babs" Asper, who died suddenly on July 30 at age 78, is being remembered for her passion, her wide-ranging philanthropy and her quiet community leadership, despite having lived much of her life behind the scenes while I.H. (Israel) Asper, her late husband and partner in philanthropy, garnered the headlines.

"Babs was a very dear friend for more than 50 years," said fellow community leader and philanthropist Dee Buchwald, whose late husband, Harold, was a founding partner in the law firm Buchwald Asper Henteleff more than 50 years ago. "There were very few like Babs. I will miss her terribly, as will the entire community. She was someone you could always rely on to be there for you."

Marjorie Blankstein knew Babs from the time the two of them served together on the board of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, the forerunner of the present Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

"Babs was a terrific woman," Blankstein said. "She was bright and energetic, knowledgeable, warm and friendly. Her passing is quite a loss."

Yude Henteleff, surviving partner of Buchwald Asper Henteleff, said she was more than just the glue that held her family together while her husband pursued careers, in turn, as a tax lawyer, political leader and business mogul.

"She was Izzy's partner in philanthropy," Henteleff said. "They shared a passion for the arts and human rights, Israel and, especially, their community."

Babs Asper grew up in south Winnipeg and met her future husband in high school. After university and her marriage to Izzy, she worked to help support her husband while he attended law school.

While she was a stay-at-home mom while her children – David, Gail and Leonard – were growing up, she volunteered with a number of different organizations such as the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education, the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre and the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University. She and her husband jointly founded the Asper Foundation, which she chaired.

There have been very few initiatives that have had as dramatic an effect on the Winnipeg Jewish community as the Asper Foundation. Its grants played a major role in building the Asper Jewish Community Campus, as well as in the wider educational (the Asper School of Business and the Babs Asper professorship in jazz performance at the University of Manitoba), artistic and medical fields in Winnipeg. The foundation has also supported many projects in Israel.

But the project that had been closest to Babs Asper's heart over the past decade was the creation of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, which was conceived by her husband shortly before he died in 2003.

Babs and her daughter, Gail, have turned that vision into a reality with their tireless fundraising efforts. Just about a week before her passing, she and Gail toured the museum (which is scheduled to open in 2012) to check progress, and Babs was reportedly very impressed by what she saw.

"Babs died too soon," Henteleff said. "She had so much still to look forward to. In her own quiet way, she was a driving force in our community. Her passing is a dreadful loss."

Israeli ambassador visits Camp Kadimah

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Spending a few hours at idyllic Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia evoked words of praise from Israel's ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv, Nova Scotia Premier Darrell Dexter, and Halifax MP Geoff Regan.

Israel's Ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv, talks with Nova Scotia Premier Darrell Dexter, left, and Camp Kadimah co-director Jim Spatz during a recent visit to the camp.
[Bonnie Abramsky photo]

"I'm very impressed – by the size of the camp, the fact that children are here from the Atlantic provinces, Ontario and Israel, and by the happy atmosphere of everyone," Ziv said. "I'm so impressed that the Atlantic Jewish Council does so much in such a small community."

The camp guests watched the final march-past of Maccabia, the annual team competition that ties in athletics, drama, song, dance and other camp activities.

Dexter remarked about the spirit of the campers and staff at Kadimah, which is celebrating its 67th year. It's located on Lake William, near Barss Corner in Lunenburg County on the south shore of Nova Scotia.

"I grew up a short distance from here and had many joyous summers on lakes in this region. It's a magnificent setting," he said.

"The level of engagement, the extraordinary spirit of the kids who were clearly having a great time, was very impressive," he continued. "It's hard to imagine they carried out this event in just three days. The team banners [created once the start of Maccabia is announced] were spectacular. It's really hard to believe such young people created those."

Regan was accompanied by Benjamin Burgar, a summer student intern in his Halifax office. "While I could see the fun everyone was having, I was most impressed that Ben, a camper and staff member at Kadimah for nine years, was treated like a rock star when we arrived. Everyone knew him."

This was Ziv's third trip to the Halifax region since her term as ambassador started a year ago. She met with Dexter on business issues last November and attended Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations in May.

At Kadimah, she met with several campers and staff from the north of Israel. "This is a wonderful way to expose them to Jews in the Diaspora. I had a wonderful discussion with them, talking about peace and democracy. Most of them didn't know what an ambassador was or what I do, and they were very curious."

She said the Israelis expressed their joy at being at Kadimah. "They appreciate what the Atlantic Jewish Council has done in bringing them here. They feel very much part of the camp, certainly not separate."

She noted she has travelled across the country, meeting Jews from coast to coast. "It's easy for the ambassador to be absorbed in Ottawa, but there's a big country outside. The consuls general [in Montreal and Toronto] visit the regions, but the ambassador is supposed to be there for all of Canada. I want to reach out to the provinces and encourage them to work with Israel. There is so much the provinces can do, in addition to what the federal government does with Israel."

In his earlier meeting with Ziv, Dexter talked about a trip he made to Israel in 2008 with other provincial leaders, and about a planned trade mission to Israel involving Nova Scotia businesses this coming November.

"We know how important Zim [the shipping firm] is to Nova Scotia as one of the key components of our Halifax port. I'm looking forward to going to Haifa to meet with Zim officials and affirming our relationship," Dexter said.

"We also know of the technical strength in Israel, how Israelis take ideas and innovation from paper to the final product to increase Israel's GDP. In Nova Scotia, we're good at establishing patents, but often don't take them to the end product. We can learn from what Israel has done."

Canadian Press reporter Stephanie Levitz of Ottawa, who has covered Parliament Hill, attended Kadimah for almost 10 years as a camper and staff member. In a tweet to Regan, she encouraged him to have a grilled cheese sandwich there.

"They're the best," she messaged, recalling her favourite Kadimah meal.

Did he have one? "No," said Regan. "They served us a turkey dinner, and that was certainly worthwhile."

On behalf of Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, CIJA, we extend our deepest condolences to David, Gail and Leonard Asper and families on the loss of their beloved mother and grandmother

Manitoba report critical of nursing home

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Families with relatives living at the Sharon Home say a newly released provincial report that looked into the workings of Winnipeg's only Jewish nursing home vindicates their allegations of abuse there.

Lillian Peck

The report, by the province's Protection of Persons in Care Office (PPCO), was made public at a meeting at the Sharon Home on July 25. But problems that have been festering there came to light last fall, when a 93-year-old resident, Lillian Peck, was transferred to a hospital where it was found she was suffering from severe, untreated bed sores. She died shortly thereafter.

Immediately after the incident, one nurse was fired, while seven others received short suspensions.

The PPCO report was critical of the lack of care Peck received, as well as leadership and communication at the residence. As a result of its findings, Manitoba's ministry of health is reviewing leadership and communications issues at the home, as well as its operating licence. The report also proposed an action plan to make improvements.

At the beginning of the year, Marsha Palansky – Peck's daughter – and four other families with relatives living in the home formed an informal group and pushed for a government investigation of the facility.

"The administration wouldn't meet with us as a group," said Harriet Berkal Sarbit, spokesperson for the five families, and daughter of the late Rabbi Louis Berkal, longtime cantor and assistant rabbi at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, who lived at the Sharon Home for a year before his death in 2009.

"They called us troublemakers," Palansky said.

In light of the nursing home administration's stonewalling, the families turned to the provincial government. Berkal Sarbit praised the positive response and support they got from the ministry of health and the Winnipeg Regional Health Authority (WRHA), which is responsible for overseeing nursing homes in the city.

Both the WRHA and the PPCO conducted investigations concerning Peck's care and treatment, while the province is conducting a performance-standards review of the home and an outside consultant will examine how its administration deals with family members.

"The reviews are unprecedented," Berkal Sarbit said.

The Sharon Home opened its new south Winnipeg location in 2002 and completed the facility in 2008. The building replaced the old north Winnipeg Sharon Home, which was built in 1912.

Berkal Sarbit, Palansky and others who spoke on condition of anonymity because they still have parents living at the Sharon Home have a number of criticisms of the facility. They claim that Sandra Delorme, its president and CEO for the past nine years, rarely visits the patients and doesn't know most of their names.

They also allege that family members who question the care of their loved ones have been threatened with being banned from the home and that some have actually been barred.

They also decry a lack of programs and services for the residents, as well as general neglect.

They are calling for the election of board members who have thus far all been appointed and include few if any people who have family living in the home.

Berkal Sarbit also objects to the practice of carrying bodies of deceased residents out the front door instead of exiting unobtrusively out the back. "I know of no other nursing home that takes the dead out the front door," she said.

She said the July 25 meeting was the first town hall meeting that the administration and board have ever held.

Berkal Sarbit added that "Winnipeg's Jewish nursing home can be so much better. Our committee can only accomplish so much. It is up to the wider Jewish community to demand change."

Delorme did not respond to requests for comment, and one board member who was contacted declined to discuss the issue.

Fire leaves 18 Tosher families homeless

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — It might take a significant amount of time for the close-knit enclave of chassidic Tosher Jews in Boisbriand to recover fully from a devastating July 30 fire that left 18 families homeless.

"It's an absolute miracle that nobody was hurt or killed," said Isaac Weiss, a volunteer with the community's Hatzolah emergency medical service.

"If this had happened just one hour later, people would have been asleep, and for sure somebody would have died," said Weiss, 35.

As it is, "there are about 150 kids who are now homeless," he said.

According to reports and Weiss' own chronology of events, the fire broke out at an 18-unit, three storey apartment building at around 11 p.m., about two hours after the end of Shabbat. Initial indications were that the source of the fire was an electrical problem, and there is no suspicion of arson.

מה קורה באוהלים

ויש בבית החולים הזה ביתן מיוחד בקומת הכניסה, שאליו יכולים ההורים להביא את הכלב או החתול או הג'רביל של הילד, והוא יכול לשחק איתם שעות ארוכות. ובנו שם ביתן אפילו יותר גדול שאליו יכולים הורים להביא את הסוס של המשפחה לביקור, כיאות לאלברטה שבה יש למשפחות רבות סוסים. ראיתי את המראה הקסום הזה ודמעה עמדה בעיני- מקום שיש בו כל כך הרבה רספקט לילד מאושפז- הוא מקום טוב של אנשים טובים.

Panel of experts to address protests in Israel

— Proposals expected by the end of September —

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was expected to reveal Monday the makeup of a team of experts whose task will be to propose economic steps to address the mounting public protests.

The panel is to be chaired by Prof. Manuel Trajtenberg, who formerly headed the government's economic advisory council, and is slated to include academic experts, businessmen, Bank of Israel representatives, and officials from the finance, industry and other ministries.

Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz will head the team, but it is still unclear which other ministers will be included.

The PMO said only that the team would include ministers from every party in the coalition.

The PMO confirmed that Netanyahu had personally approached a number of experts but refused to divulge their names. His aides said that the delay and secrecy stemmed from the need to examine possible conflicts of interest that some of the experts may have in joining the team.

Sources at the PM's office said that Netanyahu will define the mandate of the committee, which is to submit proposals for reform to the socioeconomic cabinet by the end of September. That body, headed by Steinitz, will review the ideas and submit its own recommendations to Netanyahu by the end of October. Netanyahu may make additional changes, after which he will submit a final draft to the cabinet for approval. That is supposed to happen in late October or early November.

"I want the government's full backing in the enormous change we are about to make in Israel's economy," Netanyahu said at Sunday's cabinet meeting.

Netanyahu said that Trajtenberg's panel will submit recommendations on the following issues: "One, a change in priorities, with the goal of easing the economic burdens on Israel's citizens. Two, a change in the mix of tax payments. Three, expanding access to social services. Four, increasing competition and efficiency in the goods and services markets, with the goal of reducing prices. Five, implementing the housing plan we've already launched."

Dafni Leef, the woman widely regarded as the originator of the "tent city" protests.

Sources in the PM's office said that the "team of experts will formulate recommendations and will sit with the representatives of the protest in order to hear them. We are hopeful that we will have interlocutors and subjects to discuss, and that there will be a clear representation of the demonstrators. We will alter some of our priorities, but we will not exceed the budget limits."

Over the weekend Netanyahu said during private meetings that the economic crises in Europe and the United States and the lowering of the American credit rating show that "rushed and irresponsible steps may easily undermine Israel's economy." He added that "some key countries in Europe are on the verge of bankruptcy. I will not allow this to happen in Israel."

The decision to set up a panel of experts replaces the move Netanyahu announced last week: to have a small group of ministers conduct a dialogue with the protesters. A panel headed by an outside expert will be less vulnerable to coalition pressures, but will also have less status and authority. Moreover, the fact that it won't submit its recommendations directly to the cabinet or the prime minister, as the panel of ministers was to have done, but only to the socioeconomic cabinet, will both delay the process and make it more likely that the proposals will be altered substantially.

Trajtenberg, a professor of economics at Tel Aviv University, currently heads the Council for Higher Education's planning and budgeting committee. Under Netanyahu's predecessor, Ehud Olmert, he set up and led the economic advisory council. His appointment to head the current panel is surprising, as he is not considered close to Netanyahu.

> Netanyahu tells cabinet, 'I want the government's full backing in the enormous change we are about to make in Israel's economy'.

"I'm attentive to the protest, but we can't satisfy everyone," Netanyahu stressed at the cabinet meeting. "We'll listen to everyone. We'll act sensitively and responsibly... We'll conduct a real dialogue. We won't present lip-service solutions. We want to bring real solutions. In the end, we'll be judged on our practical solutions."

Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin said Sunday that the ongoing protests might lead to early elections.

Trajtenberg told the cabinet that public frustration is high, but this is also an opportunity to effect real change.

French JCCs consider focus on culture over 'community'

Alex Weisler
JTA

PARIS — It's hard to think of a more innocuous word for most American Jews than "community." But in France, things aren't so simple.

France's national ethos frowns on displays of ethnic difference. So, for many French Jews, the word "community" conveys a sense of separatism and insularity that clashes with the way they see their lives: French first, Jewish second.

That, in turn, causes headaches for France's Jewish centres communautaires, community centres.

"When you say 'Jewish community,' it's considered segregation and then it's not French enough," said Smadar Bar-Akiva, executive director of the World Confederation of Jewish Community Centers. "It's interesting because in other countries, community is the most important thing."

The issue is distracting enough that the Fonds Social Juif Unifié (FSJU) – the umbrella group that co-ordinates most aspects of communal French Jewish life – is considering changing the name of the centres, removing the emphasis on community and stressing something that better reflects the facilities' commitment to culture and identity.

"We're working now on improving the image of the JCC," said Jo Amar, the FSJU's director of cultural action. "We have felt for a long time that we have a problem."

Though plans for change are far from set in stone, representatives of some French community centres said a shift could be welcome.

"The spirit is to find a balance between community centre and cultural centre," said Sharon Mohar, an Israeli transplant who co-ordinates cultural efforts for a centre that serves the 2,000-family Jewish community in Bordeaux.

The question is also tied to how the centres relate to non-Jews. Mohar recalled an instance in which some older members of the community cautioned against allowing non-Jews to attend a community-run preschool, fearing that they would scare away Bordeaux Jews. But she found that a policy of openness ended up appealing to Jews.

Jo Amar

"In 2011, most people are just people, and it's not that it's less important for them to keep Jewish… but I think they are truly trying to find a balance between this part and the rest," she said. "The balance is critical – [otherwise], we're talking about a ghetto, and that's not the reality people want."

Ilan Levy, who co-ordinates cultural programs for the three-year-old Hillel building serving the Jewish community in Lyon, France's second-largest city, said Jews tend to be more apt to attend events intended for non-Jews, too.

"If we make events for all the people, then the others come and the Jews say, 'Oh, if the others come, then we can go,'" Levy said.

At France's largest Jewish community centre in Paris – catering to the country's largest Jewish community – there is a renewed focus on bringing in new audiences and interacting with them virtually, said Jean-Francois Strouf, the centre's communications co-ordinator.

The centre is developing an online university teaching Jewish and non-Jewish topics. The first of its kind in France, the project recently received funding from the Paris regional government and should be operational by 2013.

The facility prides itself on providing the Paris community with a well-rounded slate of programming that doesn't discriminate on the basis of religion or, within Judaism, by denomination.

"It appears that a community centre in the United States is a kind of private club," said the facility's director, Rafy Marceanu, citing the sometimes high membership fees and perks such as pools and fitness centres. "In France, it's the place of all Jews, and everybody finds his place."

Regarding the larger rethinking of JCCs' identities, the FSJU's plan is still a work in progress, and each centre will have the ability to make its own choices about any future name change. But Amar said the conversation is still worth having. "We want to put it on the table and revisit the whole notion," he said.

Cologne unearths Jewish past, looks to future

Alex Weisler
JTA

COLOGNE, Germany — This city in western Germany is banking its future on its Jewish past.

But at present, the investment is exacting a heavy price: $52 million (US), to be exact.

Following a divisive, decades-long battle, Cologne's municipal government voted recently to allocate that sum toward the construction of a new museum focused on the city's medieval Jewish quarter. Its centrepiece will be the product of a massive excavation project that began in 2007 in the middle of the city, on the square in front of city hall.

For years, the project had been dogged by opponents who said the country didn't need another monument dedicated to the Jewish past or complained about the disruption that the project would create in Cologne, Germany's fourth-largest city.

But with Cologne's decision to fund the museum, adding to the $18 million already allocated by the state government of North Rhine Westphalia, the city has made a decisive choice: to embrace its Jewish past to attract future tourists.

"A city like Cologne, you always have to think about what you can present to bring new tourists," said Cologne City Councilman Ralph Sterck, who voted in favour of the project, which passed by a two-thirds majority in the 90-member council. "We are proud of what we have for history, so we want to show the world."

The museum's projected revenue was among the factors that prompted city council members to support the allocation, he said, but there was also the element of embracing Cologne's Jewish heritage. All over Europe, from Girona, Spain, to Vilnius, Lithuania, cities and countries are making similar decisions in the hopes that becoming a Jewish travel destination will bring in tourism dollars.

In Germany, much of the effort to memorialize Jewish history has focused on the Holocaust era, and Cologne has three other museums concentrating at least partly on World War II-era history. The new project is spotlighting a period when Jewish life thrived in the city – the 1400s.

The museum, which plans to open in 2015, will offer a new way of looking at German Jewish history, said Georg Quander, Cologne's deputy mayor for cultural affairs. It was Quander who lobbied the City Council to provide the funding for the planned museum.

"History is always an exchange between several cultures," he said. "I think it's very important to understand this. Maybe it's more important than to separate them."

Sven Schutte, the leader of the Cologne excavation and museum project, concurred.

"If you concentrate just on the Jews in the Nazi times, you put the Jews in a corner that they never have been in," he told JTA. "To show all this rich history is something which should be done."

Schutte, who is not Jewish, said he is glad the museum will focus on how Jews have been integrated into Cologne city life for centuries rather than excluded from it.

"If you look at Jewish museums, even in Berlin, you see a separate history and you can think that the Jews come from the moon, that they were not an integral part," he said. "This is a site where you can learn how to live together with other people."

The massive project to unearth Cologne's medieval Jewish quarter began four years ago. The city had begun excavating its past decades ago, but until recently, the focus was on its Roman quarter. Archeologists working on the Roman quarter actually threw away Jewish material that they had unearthed.

But in the late 1980s, the calls began for excavating the Jewish quarter, and in the 1990s, some archeological work was done. For a long time, pedestrians could peer down through a glass pyramid on a city square and see the medieval mikvah, or ritual bath, that Cologne's Jews had used hundreds of years ago.

But the real work on the Jewish quarter did not begin until 2007. Archeologists early on uncovered evidence of a thriving merchants' quarter where the Jews lived. They unearthed a synagogue that had been in use since the year 780 and the home of a goldsmith. Both will be showcased in the new museum.

At its peak in medieval times, the Jewish quarter housed about 1,000 people – the size of a small German city. It was the oldest Jewish community in Europe north of the Alps, and often enjoyed special privileges, such as when the Roman emperor Constantine decreed in the year 321 that Jews could be elected to the city council.

When Jews were targeted during the Crusades, Cologne officials often protected the Jews by hiding them in fortresses and safe houses. In 1349, a pogrom in the midst of the Black Plague killed many of the city's Jews.

About 20,000 Jews lived in Cologne immediately before the Holocaust. About 40 per cent emigrated before they could be deported to concentration camps.

Archeologists find Second Temple artifacts

JTA

JERUSALEM — Artifacts from the Second Temple period have been found in Jerusalem.

A sword in a scabbard that belonged to a Roman soldier and an engraving of the Temple's menorah on a stone object were discovered recently during excavation work in the 2,000-year-old drainage channel discovered between the City of David and the Jerusalem Archeological Garden near the Western Wall.

The findings were announced on the eve of Tisha b'Av, which commemorates the destruction of both the first and second Temples in Jerusalem.

The channel served as a hiding place for residents of Jerusalem from the Romans during the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE.

The excavations are being conducted on behalf of the Israel Antiquities Authority, in co-operation with the Nature and Parks Authority and are underwritten by the City of David Foundation

The 2,000-year-old iron sword was discovered still in its leather scabbard, along with parts of the belt that carried the sword.

The engraving of the menorah shows that its base was tripod shaped. Researchers believe that someone who saw the menorah was impressed by its beauty and etched his impressions on the stone, afterward tossing it away.

Bill confirms 'Jewish state'

The Knesset is considering a bill that would enshrine in Israel's basic laws a definition of the country as a Jewish state and the homeland of the Jewish people. Avi Dichter of the Kadima Party and Zeev Elkin of Likud introduced the bill and have received 42 supporting signatures. The measure needs 61 votes to be signed into law. In one section, the bill aims to elevate Hebrew to Israel's only formal language. Arabic would be afforded "special status" in the country. In addition, the legislation will grant "constitutional status to state symbols, national holidays, the flag and the national anthem." It also confirms the State of Israel as having a democratic government. If the bill passes it will become Israel's eighth basic law. Israel, which has no formal constitution, uses basic laws as a way to legislate government issues and civil rights. "Cementing issues that seem basic in a basic law has become doubly important these days, when there are those who wish to annul the Jewish people's right to have a national home in their own country," Dichter said.

Fogel murders conviction

An Israeli military court convicted one of two Palestinians charged in the murder of five members of a West Bank Jewish family. Hakim Awad, 18, of the northern West Bank town of Awarta, was convicted in a series of weapons-related and security offences, as well as five cases of murder, after confessing to killing five members of the Fogel family in the settlement of Itamar. The other suspect in the murders, Amjad Awad, 19, is being tried separately, as the two are testifying against each other. During his trial, Hakim Awad described being beaten by relatives after they learned of the murders, and that he had threatened to return to Itamar to kill again. Sentencing arguments will be heard next month. The prosecution says it won't seek the death penalty.

Israel hosts Wikimaniacs

Israel is hosting the seventh annual Wikimania conference, a three-day event for Wikipedia enthusiasts and contributors. At the heart of this year's conference, which was scheduled to begin this Thursday, is an effort to bring the resources of Wikipedia to places without dependable Internet access. Hamakor, an Israeli-based non-governmental organization, and Wikimedia Israel are working together on a pioneering program to install 50 refurbished computers with an offline French version of Wikipedia. The computers were distributed to two education centres in West Africa with no libraries or informational resources. The effort was made possible by a new Wikimedia initiative called OpenZim, which works to bring Wikipedia to areas of the world without Internet access. Participants from 56 countries – some of which do not have diplomatic relations with Israel, according to Tomer Ashur, director of the Wikimedia Foundation in Israel – were slated to attend the conference.

Israel considering changes to dairy products pricing

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Talks with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on how to lower the prices of dairy products and introduce changes to the industry ended with no results late last month after 4-1/2 hours of tense meetings.

In principle, it was agreed that the economy must be opened up to dairy imports, but a dispute between Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz on one side and Agriculture Minister Orit Noked and Industry, Trade and Labor Minister Shalom Simhon on the other prevented any actual decision on how much to lower customs duties and quotas.

"There is no reason for the Israeli public to pay more for dairy products than people in most western nations," Netanyahu said. The solution to the market failures in the dairy supply chain must be based on increasing competition, which will lead in the long term to lower prices for consumers, he added.

The meetings were conducted in the Prime Minister's Office. PMO Director General Eyal Gabbai mediated.

Netanyahu insisted that the parties reach a decision at the meeting, saying talks could not be stretched out any longer because the public is up in arms.

The treasury has asked to permit imports of 5,000 tons of hard cheeses without any customs duties, but the Industry, Trade and Labor Ministry only agreed to increase the quota from 1,080 tons to 2,500 tons. The 1,080-ton amount comes with a hefty 50 per cent customs duty. Unlimited amounts of more expensive specialty cheeses, such as brie, camembert and parmesan, can be brought in – but with 100 per cent duty.

The Finance Ministry wants all 5,000 tons to be admitted with no, or minimal, customs duties. The Industry, Trade and Labor Ministry is willing to allow only the 2,500 tons – but with zero per cent customs. The Agriculture Ministry is still insisting on the 1,080 ton limit, though duty-free. "We should wait and see how the market responds to the customs reduction, and only then decide on opening the market to imports," Noked said.

Another dispute that Gabbai was asked to referee concerns the price the dairies pay farmers for raw milk. Noked refused to allow the current price of 2.19 shekels per litre to be changed. Simhon proposed lowering the price by 10 agorot, but Steinitz wanted to double that price cut. Every one agora reduction in raw milk prices would reduce the retail price of a litre of milk by around eight agorot.

Hard, "yellow" cheese was chosen to be the first product for expanded imports, since it has a long shelf life. The hard cheese market is worth 700 million shekels a year. Opening the market to imports would harm Tnuva in particular, which has an 80 per cent market share in this area. Cottage and yellow cheeses are two of Tnuva's most profitable products, and the company has already been forced to lower its cottage cheese prices.

Increasing cheese imports would also hurt dairy farmers. It takes about 13 litres of milk to produce one kilogram of cheese, and farmers fear large-scale imports would reduce demand for raw milk.

No timetables or details were set on such imports at last month's meeting. Gabbai is to meet with representatives from the relevant ministries to work out the details, with the goal of reaching an agreement as soon as possible.

Steinitz said opening the market to imports would be done with sensitivity, in order to cause as little harm as possible to the country's dairy farmers.

Tnuva said in a statement that it would wait for the full decisions of the prime minister and the cabinet ministers before commenting.

Knesset committee approves funds for Gaza evacuees

Amiram Cohen

JERUSALEM — The Knesset Finance Committee has approved another 400 million shekels ($112 million) for former business owners, who were evacuated from Gaza in 2005. The bill will now go to the full Knesset for its second and third readings, where it is expected to pass.

The committee approved the private member's bill sponsored by Likud MK Zeev Elkin that would raise the compensation by 11.5 per cent for business owners who left Gaza. If it passes, the total paid in compensation to the evacuated business owners would total 3.48 billion shekels ($974 million) over the years.

Elkin explained the law is needed since the compensation paid up to now has not completely covered investments put into the businesses and money spent to rebuild them after the evacuation.

The committee, chaired by MK Moshe Gafni of United Torah Judaism, said farm owners who were moved could choose between compensation in the form of additional agricultural land or money. The compensation for farmers will also include the loss of crops in the growing seasons they were unable to farm during the transition.

"The proposed law was approved in the spirit of the national inquiry commission on the matter of the authorities' handling of the Gush Katif and northern Samaria evacuees," said the Finance Committee spokesperson.

Gafni said the committee views passing the law and providing aid to the evacuees as of utmost importance, and as such is a moral commitment.

"This is a historic moment of closing the saga of the serious harm to human dignity of the Gush Katif and northern Samaria evacuees," said Elkin.

Science and Technology Minister Daniel Hershkowitz, a member of Habayit Hayehudi party, who was the chair of the ministerial committee in charge of aid to the Gaza evacuees, said passage of the bill would finally end the suffering of the evacuees after six "horrible and unneeded years."

An important addition to canon of Anne Frank literature

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

In 1986, when Gerti Elias moved with her husband, Buddy, from Berlin to her mother-in-law's home in Switzerland, she found a treasure-trove of old boxes and suitcases in the attic filled with letters, cards and documents – some 6,000 in all – all of which she knew were of important historical value.

Her husband, after all, was the cousin and childhood friend of Anne Frank, and his mother, Helene Elias, was the sister of Otto Frank, Anne's father. Many of the letters found were written by family members including several by Anne, her sister, Margot, and Otto – one of which was a touching letter written shortly after his liberation from Auschwitz when he was still unsure of the fate of his daughters.

The documents were turned over to Mirjam Pressler, the German translator of Anne Frank's diary, to write a narrative of the Frank family. The result is Treasures from the Attic: The Extraordinary Story of Anne Frank's Family (Doubleday), an important addition to the wealth of Anne Frank literature.

Before Hitler's rise to power, the Franks were a financially well-off, assimilated secular family living in Frankfurt. They were a close, loving family. Otto would advise his sister, Leni, on her love life, and his frequent letters from abroad, where he travelled often for business, were much anticipated by his mother and siblings.

All that changed in 1931 when Hitler came to power, forcing the Franks to leave Germany. Otto's mother, Alice, went to Switzerland with her daughter, Leni, and Leni's two sons. In hindsight, Otto made the wrong choice and took his wife, Edith, and their two young daughters, Anne and Margot, to Amsterdam.

The children were encouraged to express themselves in writing from an early age, and poetry and greeting cards were frequently sent to one another for birthdays and holidays.

One of the first letters from Anne to survive was written in December 1938 when she was nine, to her grandmother. In it, Anne asks her if "it was Chanukah over there [Switzerland] too." It was written in German, but her later letters were all in Dutch. She signed with her nickname "Zartlein" (delicate little one).

Anne and the rest of her family wrote to Alice and Leni frequently in the years before they went into hiding, shedding light onto their thoughts and emotional states at the time. A letter from Edith implies that Otto was looking to get papers to go to England and Cuba, which if either succeeded would have provided a highly different outcome.

Following the German invasion of Holland and the introduction of the anti-Jewish laws in 1940, the future started to look grim for Otto and his family. In one letter to her grandmother, Anne writes, "I hardly get a chance to get a tan because we're not allowed to go to the swimming pool. It's a shame, but there's nothing we can do about it." It's with bitter irony, of course, that we realize that within a year or two, getting a tan would be the least of Anne's worries.

One of the last letters from Otto before the family went into hiding in 1942 to his sister, Leni, included the cryptic comment that "we can't correspond with... you anymore... there's nothing we can do about it." (That last line echoes Anne's sentiments. One wonders if "there's nothing we can do about it" was a constant refrain in the Frank household.)

By 1942, the letters stopped coming, and we wonder how Alice and Leni lived with the uncertainty of what became of them.

They had reason to be fairly optimistic when they received a formal business letter from Johannes Kleiman, the head of the Dutch Opekta Company for whom Otto worked. He included a mysterious comment that "our little girl has gotten as tall as my wife." Since the Kleimans had no daughter, the Eliases believed the comment was about Anne.

By far the most moving segment of the book is the chapter called "Uncertainty," which describes the events immediately following the war.

Of course, back in Switzerland, Leni and Alice were aware of the horrors that befell Europe's Jews. They had seen the newsreels and the newspaper pictures. Inevitably, they were filled with anxiety for what fate befell their relatives.

Unexpectedly, late in the summer of 1945, they got a moving letter from Otto, who was on his way to France from Odessa. The letter would pull the rug out from under their feet.

In it, Otto explained to them that his beloved wife, Edith, died in January, but his "hopes are for my children," who obviously weren't travelling with him. He held out hope that they were safe. This is the first time that Leni and her mother heard that the Nazis had captured Otto and his family.

The chapter follows a series of back and forth letters between Otto and his relatives back in Switzerland, mostly read out of sequence due to the unreliable mail delivery of the time. They soon got a heartbreaking letter from Otto telling them that he heard from a reliable witness that that his daughters both died in Bergen-Belsen. These letters and emotions that they evoke are among the most moving pages I've ever read.

In a letter dated August 1945 to his mother, Otto references, for the first time, Anne's diary, which he found at the Dutch safe house. "I don't have the strength to read it," he tells her.

But he did read it and started sharing excerpts with family and friends, eventually getting her diary published.

The diary and the play that shortly followed were hugely successful, although Otto was sometimes disappointed that no one talked about his other daughter, Margot. "Everyone talks about Anne, but I had two children. No one talks about Margot," he said.

Moving and heartwarming, Treasures from the Attic is an emotional and insightful look at the Frank family before, during and after the war. Today, when letters are a dying art, replaced by the short shelf life of the e-mail, text and tweet, we have to be grateful for the historical value of the good old-fashioned letter.

Leapin' Louie hits Toronto's streets

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

David Lichtenstein, a.k.a. Leapin' Louie Lichtenstein, is the most explosive Lithuanian Jewish cowboy, part comedian/part clown, to ever come out of Oregon.

Those attending the 12th annual Scotiabank BuskerFest, Toronto's international street performers festival in the St. Lawrence Market neighbourhood, Aug. 25 to 28, can catch this eccentric cowboy comedian let loose on our streets throughout the four-day festival with his interactive 40-minute show.

Lichtenstein, who also goes by "The Roping Fool," entertains with physical comedy, world-class lasso and whip tricks, topped off with a unicycle equipped with a horse saddle. It is the first time that Leapin' Louie will appear on Toronto's streets – or for that matter, anywhere east of Edmonton and west of Montreal.

"My grandma taught me to do a little bit of trick roping when I was 11 on her ranch," says Lichtenstein about his late maternal Jewish grandma, Eunice Curtis. "I didn't do too much with it until I met jugglers later on at the Oregon Country Fair and at festivals in Oregon where street performers hang out.

"She had an interesting life – she went around picking pine cones for the Christmas wreath business and then she travelled around to florists to tell them how to use them in bouquets year-round to expand her business. For decades, she would drive up and down the West Coast of America in a truck, sleeping above the pine-cone-filled truck and bringing it back to the warehouse on her ranch before shipping them off. When I used to go visit her ranch as a kid, I got bitten by the cowboy life, even though I was pretty much a town kid with my mom and dad."

The Toronto BuskerFest is North America's largest street performers' festival. Last year, the event attracted more than a million spectators. This year, organizers expect the festival will reach even a bigger audience.

In addition to Leapin' Louie, acts include unique pogo-sticking, hula-hooping, fire-breathing, artistic juggling, and body-contorting.

"I do a lot of street festivals, but we don't have street festivals in the States, so it is not what I do in America," Lichtenstein said. "I just got back from Europe where I do festivals that are identified as street festivals in some way. In the States, I work with a nightclub circus called the Wanderlust Circus. I do the art festivals and state county fairs."

Lichtenstein's act includes some Jewish cowboy jokes, which he says, people think is silly, but seems normal to him. He says that when you are looking for original comedy, you have to look to yourself. As of late, he's taken to wearing a yarmulke under his cowboy hat.

"Mostly acts in America and in Canada, too, try to stay pleasing everybody, so putting something specific as being 'the most explosive Lithuanian Jewish cowboy,' is against the rules for a lot of people," he said.

"I like to think I am a rule breaker, but I guess all street performers think they are rule breakers, even when they are doing the most standard juggling show," added Lichtenstein, who wants his audiences to have fun as well as look at things a little differently and perhaps question what's going on around them.

Lichtenstein has taken his act to more than 23 countries worldwide. He is a member of Clowns Without Borders and has led groups to Haiti twice in the last two years to work with children and adults devastated by the earthquake.

Leapin' Louie will be performing at Scotiabank BuskerFest from Aug. 25 to 28.

When he's not on the road, he enjoys hiking in the mountains, gardening and spending time with his two teenage children James and Lela.

Buskers at the festival will retain proceeds from the "hat" passed after their performances, except for two special group benefit shows, where proceeds go to Epilepsy Toronto: the Fire Show on Aug. 26 at 9:30 p.m., rain date Aug. 27, and the Grande Finale on Aug. 28 at 6:30 p.m, where the winner of the Metro's People's Choice Award will be announced.

High school student dreams of becoming a cantor

Laura Fixman
Intern

Jonah Lazar told his mother he wanted to be a cantor when he was 11 years old, and now at 17, he has already gained international singing experience.

He was the only Canadian asked to perform in a chamber choir at the North American Jewish Choral Festival in New York. Lazar was also the only Canadian member of HaZamir, the international Jewish high school choir, when they performed in New York in March of this year.

"It was a burden being the only Canadian but it was pretty cool," Lazar said. "I think I represented Canada pretty well."

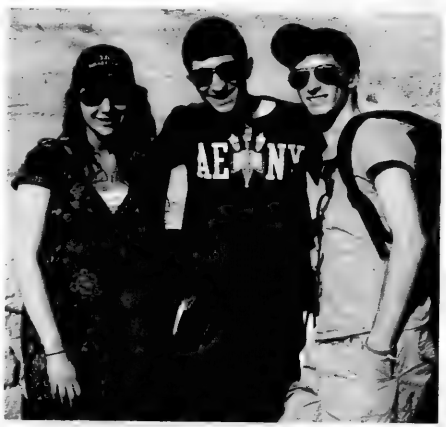
He said that performing at the North American Jewish Choral Festival was memorable.

"The audience told every member that we gave them hope," he said. "This one actually means something to someone, and it was actually helping other people."

Lazar majors in vocal music in Earl Haig Secondary School's Claude Watson Arts Program. This year, he won the Grade 11 Vocal Music Award, and he said that if he sticks with his coach, Robert Loewen of the Royal Conservatory of Music, he has a chance of winning the same award in Grade 12.

"I realized there's a lot more technique that I'm missing now that I started with my coach," he said. "For example, posture plays a big role in how the sound comes out."

After high school, Lazar hopes to get an undergraduate degree in music and then attend the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, because he said that's where the best cantors go.



Jonah Lazar, centre, with Renanim Youth Singers Samantha Cooper and Jordan Freedman.

He had some advice for others with similar dreams. "Keep learning, keep singing and keep doing what you love," Lazar said. "Sing with people who have a similar repertoire."

He added that he had several role models and influences that helped him to decide to become a cantor. One of those role models, Jeremy Burko, is now a cantor and started in the children's choir at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, as Lazar did. Lazar said he sees Burko as a friend, a coach and mentor.

Jonah's mother, Barbara, said that Burko is proud of her son's accomplishments and that Burko sees him as a protégé. She said that she is also proud of her son's accomplishments, but what sticks out in her mind is how she felt when he sang with Cantor Aaron Bensoussan at Beth Emeth.

"It felt like they were in their own spiritual space," she said. "They were inspired and they just blew me away. There were times when they took me to a different spiritual plane."

Lazar said that he's nervous when he goes on stage, but once he focuses on the music his anxiety goes away. He added that what he loves about his musical activities is the people he gets to sing with, particularly in the Renanim Youth Singers, of which he's been a member for six years.

"They all have the same interests as me musically, and they all strive to be better musicians," he said.

He added that his plans for the future include returning to HaZamir, being a part of his school choir, the Earl Haig singers, and being a member of the Beth Emeth men's chorus.

Lazar will be singing with Cantor David Edwards at the Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services at Beth Emeth.

TEATRON JEWISH THEATRE PREPARES FOR NINTH SEASON

As he gears up for a ninth season of theatrical offerings, Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre's founding artistic director, Ari Weisberg, looks back on the theatre's previous year, which he asserts "was our biggest and most successful one yet. Many of our performances were sold out, forcing us to add performances and extend our runs."

Teatron's upcoming season opens in November with Motti Lerner's powerful drama Deceived, about an American Jew who is caught transferring valuable information to Israel. It's based on the story of Jonathan Pollard. In January 2012, Teatron is staging A Tiny Piece of Land, by Joni Browne-Walders and Mel Weiser, which focuses on an American dentist's visit to a long-estranged brother in Israel and the ideological political clash that follows.

The third and final piece in Teatron's new season is Can I Really Date a Guy Who Wears a Yarmulke? Amy Holson-Schwartz's romantic comedy pairs non-religious Eleanor with the Zionistic and observant Aaron, and asks the question: "Can Eleanor, whose secular brand of Judaism might include the occasional latke but definitely does not include God, see past his yarmulke to find her true love?"

As in past years, Teatron shows no hesitation in confronting some of the major issues that challenge the contemporary Jewish world. The plays are performed in the Toronto Centre for the Arts, 5040 Yonge St., and subscriptions are $62 to $113. www.teatrontheatre.com, 416-733-0545.

The series starts with Andalusia to Toronto, a homage to the historic multicultural sounds of the Iberian Peninsula (Arabic Muwashahat, Jewish Ladino, Roma instrumental) and features horn player David Buchbinder, singers Amanda Martinez and Michal Cohen, and other musicians. (No, the Spanish province of Andalusia isn't part of the Middle East, but its powerful musical influence certainly extended in that direction.) The new season also features the return of violinist Gidon Kremer in a program celebrating composer Sofia Gubaidulina. www.rcmusic.ca

Passages: Rubino Romeo Salmoni, the Auschwitz survivor whose story inspired the Oscar-winning 1997 film Life Is Beautiful, died last month in Rome at 91.

The film, as directed by Roberto Benigni, tells the story of a man who invents elaborate fictions to shield his son from the horrors of the German concentration camp in which they are imprisoned. The film is a free adaptation of Salmoni's memoir, In the End, I Beat Hitler. Salmoni would write proudly that he lived to celebrate his golden wedding anniversary and had "12 splendid grandchildren – I think I can say I ruined Hitler's plan for me."

Salmoni was "a great man who with his courage and determination managed to save himself from the hell of Auschwitz-Birkenau," said Rome Mayor Gianni Alemanno. "Romeo was an example for young people and for the whole of Rome."

Maccabi Toronto makes pitch for 'Mini-Maccabiah'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Martin Scott and the Maccabi Toronto Academy are pitching the concept of a "mini-maccabiah" to managers of a $300,000 fund that will invest in "big Jewish ideas" to strengthen the Toronto community.

Scott, director of Maccabi Toronto, a sports club that operates elite soccer teams at the adult and youth levels, including the youth academy, believes an annual mini-maccabiah will attract young athletes, strengthen their Jewish identities and serve as a feeder to the annual JCC Maccabi Games, and perhaps eventually provide the talent for the Canadian team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

In a video presentation to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Six Points Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund (JVPF), Scott said the Mini-Maccabiah is designed for "elite young Jewish athletes, boys and girls from eight to 12 in the greater Toronto area." Scheduled to run three days in June 2012, before many youngsters head to camp, the event "will bring young Jewish athletes together as team mates and competitors."

"This differs from anything that currently exists, as this is the first step towards the long-term objective of transforming the stereotype of what a Jew 'is'," Scott stated.

"The mini-maccabiah will identify and promote elite Jewish athletes, bring together the best and begin to nurture their development. Events will mirror the JCC Maccabi Games and include team sports, soccer, basketball, and baseball. Individual sports planned are tennis, bowling, swimming, and table tennis."

Scott said Maccabi Toronto is well positioned to pull off the project, which is expected to attract some 500 young athletes. It already operates a youth academy and one of its three teams, the one with boys born in 2002, is playing at an elite level in the Soccer Academy Alliance Canada (SAAC). It has dominated competition, running up a 24-1-1 record so far.

Maccabi Toronto already operates a youth academy and one of its soccer teams is playing at an elite level, dominating its league.

The team consists of youngsters of varying backgrounds, including those whose families originally hailed from Russia, Israel, South Africa, South America and Canada. They receive professional-level coaching.

Scott expects that following the first mini-maccabiah, the best players will be selected to form elite baseball and basketball teams to go along with the soccer squads. They will receive top-level coaching and training and will be entered in competitive leagues.

Other participants will be offered training and participation in more recreational leagues. The Maccabi Academy, Scott noted, already provides such sporting activities to 200 children from ages 4 to 14.

The JVPF is funded by a group of individuals who have pooled their financial resources and business planning skills to support new and innovative programs, consistent with Jewish values. They say it will invest in projects "that will make a long-term positive impact on the Toronto Jewish community."

Chelsea complains to Malaysia over antisemitic abuse

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — The Chelsea soccer team lodged a formal complaint with the Malaysian Football Association about antisemitic abuse allegedly suffered by Israeli midfielder Yossi Benayoun during a friendly in the Muslim-majority country of Malaysia recently.

The Premier League club said on its website that while most fans at the game against a Malaysian all-star team had behaved appropriately, others had not.

"We believe Yossi was subjected to antisemitic abuse by a number of supporters at the game," the London club added. "Such behaviour is offensive, totally unacceptable and has no place in football."

Chelsea, distant runners-up to Manchester United in the English Premier League last season, said it had not complained at the time because of initial uncertainty about the nature of the abuse.

"Several players from both teams experienced similar treatment, sometimes louder and longer," the club added. "However, having taken time to consider the issue fully, it has become apparent that a formal complaint was necessary."

Chelsea was in Malaysia on a pre-season tour. From there, the team travelled to Hong Kong.

Singing contest gives teen a unique opportunity

Laura Fixman
Intern

Dayna Goldhar was eating Shabbat dinner with her family when her zaide told her about the Hallelujah singing contest.

The contest, which her grandfather had read about, was for Jewish youngsters from around the world aged 16 to 26. Goldhar thought she was too young, because she was only 15, but when she realized she would turn 16 in time to be eligible for the contest, she started working on her YouTube audition video.

"I didn't think anything would actually come from it so I didn't really take it seriously at first," she said.

She was initially told that she didn't make the top 30 finalists, a fact she accepted since she was the youngest possible age. She was shocked when she later read an e-mail saying that someone had dropped out and she was the next in line to be a finalist. "The first thing I did was call my mom, and she was crying," Goldhar said. "I was so excited, especially since I already thought I didn't make it."

Goldhar was scheduled to leave for Israel on Aug. 8 to begin a three-week tour with the other finalists, learning from professional Israeli musicians. The final stop is Ramat Hasharon, where they will perform live on Israeli national television.

Although she has been to Israel with her family before, Goldhar said this experience will be unlike anything else she's done.

"I'm going to be doing such amazing and different things in my favourite place in the world," she said. "I think I'll learn a lot about myself musically and become a better singer by talking to the professionals."

The competition also requires contestants to perform a Hebrew song in Israel, which is something Goldhar has never done before.

For her audition video, Goldhar sang Winter Song by Sara Bareilles and Ingrid Michaelson, which she had sung with a friend at the talent show at her school, the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. She felt comfortable with the song because she knew it on guitar and had loved it for a long time, but she said that if she had had more time to work on the audition, she would have chosen a different one.

"It probably wasn't the best song choice because it didn't have a wide range for my voice," she said.

She said she was impressed watching the other finalists' videos. "Some of them look really intense and professional," she said. "To be honest, I'm a bit intimidated."

In September, Goldhar will enter Grade 11 at the Etobicoke School of the Arts, and she said that when she auditioned for the school, she didn't expect that she would get in there, either. Her success there helped her gain the confidence to enter the Hallelujah contest, and she's now determined to try anything, even if she thinks she won't succeed.

"I'm just taking chances and seeing where it will take me," she said. "Even if you think you won't get something, you never know."

Goldhar doesn't have a lot of experience performing, but this year she joined the Toronto Youth Music Theatre Company and came to realize that performing was something she wanted to continue doing.

Dayna Goldhar

She said she sees music as a form of personal expression. "People at school know me as the girl who sings a lot, and that makes me different, and that's what pushes me," she said. "I love the feeling of just being able to express myself without having to speak."

Sunshine and Judaism on Oahu

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Get off the plane in Honolulu and it's easy to forget about everything else in the world.

Within 12 hours of arrival, we were on the water in a catamaran, looking out for spinner dolphins. When a pod of 60 was spotted two miles from shore, we pulled on our flippers and masks and jumped in to watch their graceful movements. With a visibility of 30 feet it was like stepping straight into an episode of National Geographic. Around us the dolphins vaulted out of the water, spinning and somersaulting before diving back into the depths. Theirs was a mesmerizing underwater ballet as they swam massive concentric circles around and below us.

Later, after we'd clambered back on the vessel, a pod of bottlenose dolphins put on a second performance for us, playing, jumping and cavorting in the wake of the catamaran. A few played at the bow, moving so close that we could hear their breathy exhalations as they broke the surface of the water. Their symmetry was exquisite, their movements graceful, deliberate and smooth. One showed off a wound on his back. "That's from the cookiecutter shark," explained Lynn Sutherland, a marine biologist and crew member on the catamaran. "It's the ugliest thing you've ever seen, with a ratio of teeth to body weight greater than any other ocean creature. When it bites, it takes a plug of flesh from the dolphins," she confides.

One of my favourite excursions was our trip to the North Shore, an hour's drive from Waikiki, to the pristine beaches and lush, heavily forested terrain of northern Oahu. We peeked into the gift shops and art galleries in the charming, rustic town of Hale'iwa and grabbed a healthy lunch at a local bakery. Then we went on toward Waimea along a coastal road that divides spectacular beaches on one side from a thick canopy of forest that blankets the hills and mountains on the other.

At one beach we joined a small group watching green turtles feeding in the shallow waves. "Tripod" was sunbathing on the rocks in his usual semi-comatose state, posing nonchalantly for the onlookers. The massive, three-flippered turtle is a frequent visitor to this shore and couldn't care less about the spectators around him. A turtle protector briefed us on the protocol: the green turtles are a protected species in Hawaii, which means it's OK to look and take pictures, but no touching is allowed.

Later, we surrender to the muggy Hawaiian heat and gratefully took a swim at Waimea Bay Beach Park. A light rain was falling, but the beachgoers didn't seem to mind. They know that in minutes, the tropical rain will turn to sunshine, because that's how it goes in paradise.

So it's not hard to understand why the island has attracted a fair number of Jews to its pearly shores. Some say there are 10,000 members of the tribe living in Hawaii – but no one knows for sure since so many of them are 'underground Jews' – unaffiliated with any Jewish organizations.

"One of the reasons people come here is to escape," explains Alice Tucker, 78, a member of Temple Emanu-El, Oahu's Reform synagogue. Tucker and her husband settled permanently in Oahu in 1961 and raised their three children on the island. But there were Jews in Oahu as early as the 1850s, traders from England, Germany and the United States.

One of them was Elias Abraham Rosenberg of San Francisco, who arrived in Hawaii in 1886 with a Torah scroll and a silver filigreed yad in his luggage. Though his stay on the island was only six months, Rosenberg made quite the impression on the reigning monarch, King Kalakaua. He spent time teaching the king to read Hebrew and gained the monarch's trust.

Political unrest on the island prompted Rosenberg to leave in June 1887, but prior to his departure, he and the king exchanged gifts. The king received the Torah scroll and yad, while Rosenberg left Hawaiian shores with a royal golden medallion and a silver cup. Rosenberg died a month later, but over the years that followed, the scroll and yad gradually made their way to Temple Emanu-El, where they remain to this day, safely ensconced in a glass cabinet.

There are several Jewish options for those visitors whose escape to the island does not preclude a reprieve from religion. With 300 members, Temple Emanu-El is the largest and oldest congregation on Oahu, located a stone's throw from the Oahu Country Club and Queen Emma's summer palace, a retreat for the monarchy between 1857 and 1885. There's a Jewish chapel at Pearl Harbor, and a Conservative congregation, Sof Ma'arav, too.

Chabad of Hawaii, now located in Waikiki, has had a presence on Oahu for close to a quarter century. Last year, it purchased a building attached to the Ala Moana Hotel, and since then, Chabad has been reincarnating the 11,000-square-foot space from a nightclub to a sanctuary.

"We have a Shabbaton every week, sometimes in two shifts," says Pearl Krasnjansky, who runs Chabad of Hawaii with her husband. On a June weekend she served 70 meals, the majority of them to Jews living on the island. Only six were visitors, among them the musician Matisyahu and his family, who stopped in Oahu for a show before heading to Maui.

"Sometimes I have a vague idea how many are coming, but most of the time it's intelligent guesswork," Krasnjansky says with a laugh. "We're the de facto stop for births, death, holidays, Hebrew school and bar mitzvahs," she confesses, in between a constant stream of phone calls, e-mails and interruptions. "I wish I could clone myself so we could do even more."

Midway State musicians always envisioned 'making it'

Midway State rock band

More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

Laura Fixman
Intern

Mike Kirsh and Mike Wise, of the rock band the Midway State, said that their new album, Paris or India, was a chance for the band to work together without any outside influences.

"There were a lot more external pressures on the first one," Kirsh said.

"The four of us were way more involved [on the new album], instead of leaving it up to our management," Wise added.

Kirsh and Wise, who make up the Jewish half of the Midway State, have been friends since they were students at Thornhill Secondary School. Lead singer and songwriter Nathan Ferraro and drummer Daenen Branberger, both from Collingwood, Ont., originally formed the band with two other musicians who were fired. Wise and Kirsh joined in 2006, and they said that each of them brings different skill sets to the band.

Bassist Kirsh controls the finances of the band, and guitarist Wise is in charge of promotion. Kirsh said that taking control of more aspects of the band made this album a better experience for them than their first one, Holes, which was released in 2008.

"We're doing exactly what we want to do as a group now, instead of doing what other people want us to do," Wise said.

Kirsh added, "After the first record we made sure we were in charge of every aspect of our career."

They both had advice for aspiring musicians. Wise said it's important to have a backup career plan but not focus too much on it. Wise added that if you're too focused on a backup plan, you lose focus from your real dream.

"You also need to be punctual," Wise said. "That's what my zaide always told me."

Kirsh added, "You need to focus on getting really good at your craft before you present your stuff."

Wise said that being Jewish doesn't really affect their music, but being in the band does make them miss a lot of Jewish holidays. Kirsh said there's a common pressure in many Canadian Jewish households to be something more stable than a musician but that their families had been very supportive.

"Music is a big part of the Jewish community I grew up in," Wise said.

He added that he knows a lot of Jewish musicians, especially from Thornhill. When Wise went on Birthright about five years ago, there were so many musicians in his group, including Dan Kanter, who is Justin Bieber's guitarist, that the trip's leaders booked a venue that they could perform in.

Wise and Kirsh said the band gets along well, and there haven't been any major fights. Kirsh attributes this to their relaxed attitude toward problems.

"Sure there's tensions, since we're four artistic beings, but there's also a lot of group instinct going on," Kirsh said.

Wise added, "We see it as like being in a relationship."

Even when they were playing small shows with their band in high school, Wise and Kirsh, who are now both 26, said they always knew they would be successful. Their songs have since been in television shows such as The O.C., and they have opened for Third Eye Blind, Death Cab for Cutie and K-OS. They were nominated for two Juno Awards and won a Much Music Video Award for Best New Artist in 2011. They did a duet with Lady Gaga, which was never commercially released but they said that it was fun to work with her.

During high school, Kirsh said they would make about $40 for a show, but they still knew that music would be how they would make their living.

"We always wanted to do this, and we always envisioned making it," Kirsh said.

When asked what they would be doing if they weren't in a band, they both had difficulty answering since they agreed that music was all they ever wanted. They said that they would try to answer for each other.

"Kirsh would be doing something cool, like running a scuba-diving school," Wise said.

"And he'd probably go to law school and become a very confused lawyer," Kirsh said, about Wise.

Their goals for the future are to keep playing and improving as musicians. They also want to continue to tour, and said they would love to play in Israel. They said they would like to have their songs in more shows and in movies. But, for now, they said they hope the band keeps doing as well as it currently is.

"If I could keep playing and have food on the table, it's hard to imagine ever doing something else," Kirsh said.

"If we stay on the trajectory we're on, we should be able to do that," Wise added.

Paris or India, released on July 19, has a different sound than their previous album, Wise said. The title track, Paris or India, written by Ferraro, is about choosing between two exotic and very different locations. He said the song is about a time in everyone's life when you have to make real adult decisions about the direction your life will take.

The album offers 10 tracks, and all of them show unique musical styles. Heart of Glass is a slow, romantic ballad, while Atlantic is a more upbeat melody and is a lot catchier. Other songs include All Anew, a more rhythmic track that's almost hyperactive in its pace. Change For You has a mournful-sounding chorus, but the verses have a bit more of a positive feel and are the type of lyrics that can get stuck in anyone's head for days.

Wise said that what the band learned from the first album made the second even better. "It's more eclectic than the first one and a little more linear," he said. "On this record every song is way more singular and unique."

Kirsh added, "We made a point to make a more upbeat album this time."

The Midway State will be touring around Canada in the fall. For more information, go to themidwaystate.blogspot.com or follow them on Facebook or Twitter at www.facebook.com/themidwaystate or @themidwaystate.

Seniors and environmental issues

The Canadian Association of Retired Persons (CARP) is a national, non-partisan, non-profit organization committed to a new vision of aging for Canada that includes promoting social change that will bring financial security, equitable access to health care and freedom from discrimination. Its mandate is to promote and protect the interests, rights and quality of life for Canadians as they age.

At the June 2011 IdeaCity conference, I spoke with Susan Eng, vice-president of advocacy for CARP. I asked her where sustainability fit into the priority of advocacy efforts that CARP undertakes. It wasn't clear how issues around the environment and sustainability are prioritized by a group that is concerned with financial security, health care and freedom from discrimination for its members.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

Eng said CARP and its members noticed that during the spring federal election, intelligent discussion about environmental issues such as energy supply and global warming was absent. Perhaps with provincial elections coming up soon in seven of the 10 provinces, there is an opportunity for CARP members to engage in a non-partisan way on these complex and evolving issues and to promote civil discourse to get beyond polarized and ideological arguments.

To that end, some people, including myself, were asked to contribute articles to the CARP Action Online newsletter and to provide questions that would be used to solicit member opinions on the issue of sustainability and the environment.

My article (http://bit.ly/carpenv01) argues that leaving the world a better place for your children and grandchildren is important. I also proposed that this is a natural fit with current CARP advocacy for financial security and equitable access to health care.

More than 3,100 people responded to the survey (http://bit.ly/carpenvlongsurvey). At the time of this writing, the survey's results were still available online.

Of those surveyed, 84.8 per cent agree that we are going through a period of changing climate, and 65.8 per cent believe it is a man-made phenomenon; 74.7 per cent agree or strongly agree that individual actions can have a significant positive effect on the environment, but only 34.5 per cent believe it's possible or very possible to alter our behaviour to avert lasting environmental damage.

Of those surveyed, 88.7 per cent agree or strongly agree that manufacturers should be responsible for their products throughout their life cycle, and 71.4 per cent agree or strongly agree that a carbon tax on industries would create incentives to limit emissions. Regarding a cap and trade approach (every industry would be allowed to emit so much greenhouse gas and those that emit more would have to buy permits from those that emit less), 47.1 per cent are in favour and 45.9 per cent are opposed, indicating that this approach would be tough to develop a consensus around.

CJN readers who are CARP members can have an impact on the public policy options that need to be identified, prioritized and acted upon.

If you have the time, take the opportunity to shape and influence how this organization, with more than 80,000 members aged 50 and over, represents them and communicates their opinions and articulates policy options around sustainability and the environment.

Israeli Canadian girl intends to join the IDF

The Almog family left Israel for Canada seven years ago. Shiri Almog was 10 years old at the time, and the experience left a lasting impression on her.

"I will never forget the winter of 2004," Almog told The CJN. "Until then, I... lived in Haifa and had a routine life at school and with my friends. Excluding that my father had been in Canada for a few months looking for work, everything was normal.

"In December, we landed in Toronto. The temperatures were -25 Celsius... and snow was all over. I found myself at Brownridge Public School, without knowing a single word of English. I was, of course, in an ESL class. Luckily, my teacher spoke some Hebrew, and some of the students in my class were from Israel. They helped me in dealing with the language gap I had. About a year later, my English was much better, and I was much more confident with myself," Almog said.

"In the beginning I missed my friends, my family... During that year [2004], the Israeli Scouts troop of the Greater Toronto Area was established and that was perfect for me. I have been active in the scouts since it was established. Next year, I will be in 12th grade and be a part of its leadership."

Shiri Almog

Through scouts, Almog made new friends with whom she is still in touch. Scouts also provided Israeli content for her life. "The Israeli vibe is very important to me," she said.

The atmosphere in Almog's home is Israeli, and the family visits Israel every summer. "In the beginning, Canada was very hard, and I did not like it that much. I slowly got used to it, and now I am getting along much better," she said. "My friends from Israel laugh at me. They say I have turned into a Canadian as I am much more polite than I used to be.

"After all, I have been in Canada seven years, which is a significant portion of my life so far. So I can say that I am both Israeli and Canadian. Israel will always be my homeland, and that is why after I finish high school I intend to go back to Israel and join the IDF. It is a duty I need to fulfil," she added.

She will have the status of a "sole soldier," since her family lives abroad, and for support she will have to count on friends and her grandparents in Haifa.

Almog stays in touch with her childhood friends by telephone, Facebook and Skype. She said her connection to Israel through her friends affected her decision to join the IDF.

Her dream career is to become an astronomer, she said. She would like to settle down in Israel eventually, where she hopes to establish her own family. And she would be happy to live in Haifa, near the Carmel Beach, which she loves.

As for the complexity of life in Israel, including the issues of security, Almog said: "I assume that one day I will face the same challenges my parents faced years ago."

Palestinians set date for statehood bid

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority will reportedly ask the United Nations to recognize Palestine as an independent state on the first day of the new session.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas will ask UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon to present the request to the Security Council on Sept. 20, when the UN General Assembly opens its 66th session, the French news service AFP reported over the weekend.

PA Foreign Minister Riyad al-Malki informed Ban of the planned timing, AFP indicated.

"We will insist on this historic initiative and Ban Ki-moon will present the request to the Security Council," al-Malki said.

Ban Ki-moon

Mahmoud Abbas

Lebanon will hold the presidency of the Security Council in September and Qatar will chair the Security Council, making September even more attractive for the request, al-Malki reportedly said. It's believed the United States will veto the request in the Security Council, but the General Assembly is likely to approve the upgrading of the Palestinian Authority's status from observer entity to non-member state.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a statement released late Saturday night that the decision is an "expected but regrettable step." The statement said Abbas has "apparently decided to avoid direct negotiations with Israel."

Meanwhile, a Palestinian official reportedly told AFP that Abbas and Israeli President Shimon Peres recently held four secret meetings in Amman and London in order to try to jump-start peace talks. A fifth meeting was cancelled two weeks ago after Netanyahu refused to allow Peres to go to Amman for a previously scheduled meeting with Abbas.

Teva To Shut Plant

MONTREAL —The Israeli drug company Teva is closing its plant in Mirabel next year. The generic drug maker, the world's largest, employs 340 people there. The layoffs will begin next March and operations should wind up by the end of 2012, the company informed the union, the Canadian Auto Workers. Teva acquired the facility north of Montreal when it bought the Germany company Ratiopharm, also a generic-drug maker, in spring 2010. But only months later, Teva announced it was selling it and consolidating its Canadian operations in the Toronto area. Teva's Canadian headquarters are in Toronto and it has three facilities in the area. Teva employs about 1,900 people across the country.

YU's graduate program in Talmud has been open to women since 2000, but Schick is the first to complete it. Trade Office Closed

CLEVELAND — The state of Ohio's department of development is closing its trade office in Israel, part of cuts being made throughout the department's global markets division, the Cleveland Jewish News reported. The two-person Ohio-Israel trade office in Tel Aviv worked with Israeli businesses interested in moving to Ohio. The office, created by former governor George Voinovich in 1990, also helped Ohio firms wanting to export to Israel. Ohio also has offices in Brussels, Tokyo, Hong Kong, Toronto, Mexico City and Johannesburg.

Iran Names Street

TEHRAN — Tehran's City Council reportedly will name a street for Rachel Corrie, the American pro-Palestinian activist killed by an Israeli military bulldozer in Gaza. Hamshari, a daily paper affiliated with the city government, said the council had decided to rename a street Rachel Aliene Corrie. Corrie was a 23-year-old student who was killed while trying to prevent the demolition of Palestinian homes. In 2010, an Irish-flagged ship in the Gaza flotilla named the Rachel Corrie was stopped by the Israeli navy. The street will be the first in Iran named for a U.S. national since the 1979 revolution. Prior to the revolution, at least three main streets in Tehran were named for ex-U.S. presidents.

Philip Levine Named U.S. Poet Laureate

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Philip Levine, a Pulitzer Prize winner in 1995, has been named the 18th poet laureate of the United States. The appointment of Levine, who at 83 is one of the oldest U.S. poet laureates, was announced Aug. 10 by Librarian of Congress James Billington.

Levine, of Fresno, Calif., is the author of 20 collections of poems, including The Simple Truth, for which he won the Pulitzer.

Philip Levine

Levine "is one of America's great narrative poets," Billington said. "His plain-spoken lyricism has, for half a century, championed the art of telling the 'simple truth' – about working in a Detroit auto factory, as he has, and about the hard work we do to make sense of our lives."

As a student, the Detroit native worked in the city's auto plants. Levine taught for many years at California State University, Fresno, where he's a professor emeritus in English. He's also taught at New York University, as well as at Columbia, Princeton, Brown and Tufts universities, and the University of California, Berkeley.

Israeli kids bond over the loss of their fathers

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

For the 38 Israeli children who ended a three-week North American trip in Toronto earlier this month, the bond they now share has less to do with their travel experience than it has to do with their struggle to deal with loss.

What these children all have in common is the loss of their fathers, who died in the service of their country.

As members of the Israel Defence Forces Widows and Orphans organization (IDFWO), a non-profit association that provides social, emotional and financial support to 9,000 widows and orphans of Israel's fallen soldiers, the children had a free vacation that included almost two weeks at Camp Chi in the Chicago area and a week travelling through New York and Toronto.

Volunteer chair Nava Shoham-Solan, who spoke with The CJN just hours before the group was preparing to go home to Israel, said the annual trips have always ended in Niagara Falls.

But thanks to the generosity of the members of the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, who hosted the children for two nights; the Kimel family who invited them to their Muskoka cottage for a day; and Marky's Restaurant owner Erez Karp for a sponsored lunch, they were able to extend the trip into Toronto for the first time and connect with the Jewish community.

"We'd like to keep in touch with the Jewish community here," Shoham-Solan said.

The trip is less about therapy and more about offering them a break from reality, she said.

"The main mission is to have fun. If the head of the delegation senses that they want to talk about their loss, he can organize something. Sometimes, the kids, even if he doesn't organize something, they may speak about the loss."

What makes this experience special, she said, is that this is the first time they are surrounded by peers who can truly relate to their pain.

"With their regular friends, they can't speak about their loss because they don't like or want to hear them crying. This is an opportunity for them to be with children who have this in common," she said.

Ro'i Schiffenbauer, the 13-year-old son of Daniel Schiffenbauer, one of six airmen who died in a helicopter training accident in Romania last year, said this program has helped him cope "very much."

Intra-communal tolerance

At least since 2002, when the second intifadah started (more accurately described as Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's last terror war against Israel), the nerves of Israel's supporters have become increasingly frayed. And we are becoming increasingly worried.

Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel
Through the generations ...a sacred trust

JEWISH FUNERALS

"Know that the highest standard of observance is here for you, in times of sorrow."

Michael Benjamin

People often tell me our strict adherence to the principle of kavod ha-met, respect for the dead, reassures them that they are doing the right thing. Our devout Chevra Kadisha has operated since 1922. Every year, we commission a new keepsake plate for members – tangible evidence that they are part of the longest serving burial society in Toronto. You can see the plates from each of our 87 years in a cabinet in the chapel foyer.

While the instigating, deliberately planned violence against Israelis met with the usual clichéd nostrums condemning violence "by both sides," or with other forms of muted criticism, if at all, Israel's measures of self-defence almost always met with louder and louder iterations of condemnation and censure from around the world.

The mythical massacre in Jenin after the slaughter of Pesach celebrants at the Park Hotel in Netanya was a blatant example of the lies that were flung at Israel. The not officially withdrawn, but privately recanted Goldstone report regarding Israel's war against Hamas was but another example of the hypocrisy and hysteria that mark the sanctimonious, self-righteous judgments of the Jewish state.

From the editor's desk...

The seemingly constant excessive denunciations of Israel, of course, encourage Israel's enemies. And they also feed the mindless maw of the monster of antisemitism that appears to be rolling unhindered these days across large tracts of the western world.

As was said, the political situation facing Israel is becoming quite worrisome. No wonder our nerves are frayed. No wonder, too, in some quarters, our behaviour to people with whom we disagree shows a sharper edge that was not there before. And this is to be regretted.

It is not surprising that supporters of Israel – good and decent people all – will differ in the details of our support. (We are not here talking about the people in Israel whose political differences are as numerous as the many ways in which they prepare eggplant.) Differences of opinion are to be expected if not also desired. When a group of many views finds common ground, the resulting voice is heard more loudly. Different voices pitched together create a harmony.

Theodore Bikel

Mandy Patinkin

There are, of course, some opinions that are simply outside the boundaries, off the musical page, so to speak. We know them when we hear them. We know, too, when the singer beyond the bounds purports to join the "choir" of reasonable differences and strength-giving diversity. Our antennae have been up for some 2,000 years and finely honed for clear reception as a result.

Unity within a people is not to be confused with uniformity. We cannot, should not and must not expect, let alone demand, uniformity.

Lately, the extent of our intra-communal tolerance for different, reasonable political points of view in support of Israel is being tested.

Last year, a group of Jewish American entertainers signed a petition supporting a boycott by some Israeli performers and artists of a newly built theatre in Ariel in the West Bank.

Two of those entertainers will soon be entertaining in Toronto. Mandy Patinkin is scheduled to perform next month in Mamaloshen. Theodore Bikel is scheduled to perform at a synagogue as part of the annual Ashkenaz Festival. Both performers are well-established celebrities who profess lifelong support of Israel. They do not, however, support the West Bank-related policies of the Netanyahu government.

Patinkin and Bikel's impending appearances in Toronto trouble a number of people within the community. To be sure, they do not agree with the entertainers' political views. Indeed they are quite bothered by them. They are bothered that the artists joined the Ariel boycott and especially that they made their support of the boycott so vociferously public.

As a result, they have been campaigning in the community against the entertainers. Some simply want to make Patinkin and Bikel's views known in the community. Others want the performances cancelled altogether.

In demanding the cancellations, have they gone too far? What is the extent of tolerance that we owe each other?

The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto issued the following appropriate statement in response to the anti-Patinkin, anti-Bikel lobbying:

"UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and CIJA, the advocacy arm of the Jewish federation system, reject all boycotts against Israel. We believe that boycott calls, whether all-encompassing or restricted to specific areas, unfairly target Israel, assist those who question Israel's legitimacy, impede negotiations and damage prospects for peace.

"While we respect the rights of those artists and performers to express their views, we profoundly disagree with their promotion of such boycotts. We also understand that community members will make their own choices about artists they wish to see and support."

Next week, I will examine other related aspects of the issue.

Doctors seek remedy for ailing system

Some 100 doctors and medical students who work for various kupat cholim (health organizations) demonstrated in Tel Aviv's central city hall square demanding better conditions for their work and for their patients. The sign in the middle reads: "A medical examination is a joke, but it is not funny." These protesters were part of a larger group of some tens of thousands of Israelis who again marched in "social justice" protests across the county on the weekend.

Ex-mashgiach challenges COR overtime policy

Kashruth Council claims it is exempted from Ontario's Employment Standards Act

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

A longtime mashgiach with the Kashruth Council of Canada has filed an action with the Ontario Labour Relations Board, saying the agency failed to meet minimum labour standards for overtime pay.

But the Kashruth Council, the country's largest kosher certification agency, which oversees the COR certification, says mashgichim "hold a religious office," exempting them from Ontario's Employment Standards Act (ESA).

Morley Rand, who was employed by the Kashruth Council for 23 years, appeared on his own behalf before an Ontario Labour Relations Board tribunal on Aug. 4, calling on the council to comply with overtime requirements, a request he first made four years ago.

A written statement from the council to The CJN said that Rand left the organization in early 2010 because of "actions which were 'wilful' disobedience and 'wilful' misconduct that were not acceptable to the employer."

Rand is currently appealing a ruling against him in a separate case related to his departure from the Kashruth Council. The council claims the overtime case was only launched as a result of Rand losing the first case.

The council told the Aug. 4 OLRB hearing that the mashgiach role is entirely religious in nature. Candidates, male and female, are chosen based on "kashrut knowledge and… educational background." There is a rabbinical reference check and a two-week on-site training period with a senior mashgiach.

A mashgiach is responsible for separating challah, checking fish for scales, checking fruits and vegetables for insect infestation, approving kosher products, kashering and immersing utensils in a mikvah and starting the cooking process, which can only be done by an observant Jew.

But Rand, whose son Michael (Melech), another former mashgiach, is also involved in the case, insists the nature of the job is practical, not a spiritual calling.

According to the council's statement, "Mr. Rand was paid overtime during his employment."

He disagrees.

In 2008, the Kashruth Council began paying time-and-a-half for public holidays and shifts exceeding 10 hours, but Rand said this "bonus" has nothing to do with the law. "If you have a six-day week of 10 hours, 60 hours, [then mashgichim receive] no overtime."

That's not unheard-of for a busy, experienced mashgiach, and the ESA requires overtime beyond 44 hours, he said.

The Kashruth Council recently circulated a notice to synagogues and on its website stating that its "overtime practices are in fact over and above the legal standards prescribed by the Employment Standards Act."

Rand finds this disingenuous. "By putting a letter on their site stating that they pay overtime – contradicting what they stated at the OLRB hearing – they have deceived their lawyer… Ministry of Labour lawyers, the [OLRB tribunal] vice-chair, me and the National Post," which ran an article about the case.

The Kashruth Council openly bills clients for overtime, but doesn't compensate mashgichim accordingly, Rand said. A memo sent in July to supervised institutions, including restaurants, bakeries and stores, advises of an increase in supervision charges due to "new Ministry of Labour Public Holiday Pay regulations."

The council's practices may also run counter to industry standards. Moti Bensalmon, speaking for Badatz Toronto, another kosher certification agency, said that "if [Badatz mashgichim] work more than 44 hours a week, they get paid time-and-a-half, which is what the law is. That's been our policy since Day 1."

Bensalmon's father, Rabbi Moshe Bensalmon, cofounder of Badatz, is also a former Kashruth Council mashgiach.

Bensalmon says the council's policy simply "doesn't jive… if a mashgiach works 9.8 hours a day, 58 hours a week, he won't get a cent in overtime."

The Labour Relations Board case is pending, and a decision isn't expected until the fall.

The Kashruth Council statement ends by saying that "if there is any silver lining to this recent publicity, it is… the opportunity to reaffirm the value that mashgichim add to the Kashruth Council and the greater Toronto Jewish community."

Chartwell's Senior Star competition touches the entire community

Al Fitleberg has experienced the Senior Star Competition on both sides of the microphone

Living in one of Chartwell's graciously appointed retirement residences — like Constantia Retirement Residence in Thornhill — allows you to experience a rewarding lifestyle close to family and friends, with access to the kinds of programs and services that make the transition from home life so seamless as to be almost transparent.

But you don't have to be a Chartwell resident to experience the pleasures of its community outreach, of which the Senior Star Compeitition is a prime example.

Just ask Al Fitleberg.

An accomplished vocalist, drummer and saxophonist who's just hitting his stride at age 74 and plays in several bands including Resa's Pieces, Al got an early introduction to the music field. Enticed out of a schoolyard funk by a kindergarten teacher who handed him a drumstick with a promise to make him the drum major of the band if he'd only come inside, Al banged on that drum with the one-fisted resolve of an early Buddy Rich and has never looked back.

Last year, his rousing medley from Fiddler On The Roof earned third place honours at the Senior Star Regional competition held at the Thornhill Community Centre. This year, at the same venue, he participated not as a contestant but as a judge, and found the experience equally gratifying.

"I always loved to sing and perform"

"From that first day in kindergarten, I always loved to sing and perform," he says. "I've been entertaining my whole life, from paid gigs at weddings and bar mitzvahs to free performances at charity events. My kids heard about Senior Star and suggested I enter. At first it seemed silly because I never really thought of myself as a "Senior". But they kept noodging me until I finally said yes.

"I'm 74 but when I belt out a tune, I'm 14 again"

"I loved it. The audience was tremendously receptive. This year, I was flattered when Chartwell asked me to come back as a judge. I got to see the competition from the other side of the microphone. Believe me, it was a lot harder judging and grading my fellow performers than it was competing with them. But it was still fun to be involved and I hope to come back next year in some capacity. When you're doing something you enjoy, time stands still. I'm 74 but when I pick up my saxe or belt out a tune, I'm 14 again."

The Senior Star Compeition has provided Chartwell with valuable national exposure, but it's the "bigger picture" of community participation that is its primary focus, says VP of Communication and Public Affairs Sharon Henderson. "We wanted to create something that would appeal to all seniors. Like a major sporting event, this is an "Open" competition — open to Canadian participants aged 65 and over. It's been a hit with everyone: participants, their families, and the general public. Nobody feels left out — except maybe the musicians and singers who are "underage". A lot of them tell us they can't wait to turn 65 so they can enter. Even a few of our judges have told us that!"

Want to turn back the clock? Not these virtuosos. Prospective Senior Star participants who are too young to qualitfy can't wait to turn it forward.

For them, a Senior Star microphone is waiting.

Film follows Schalit family struggles

Laura Fixman
Intern

The film Family in Captivity records the Schalit family's daily struggles to bring their son Gilad home after five years in captivity.

The documentary, directed by Tal Goren, was screened in Toronto Aug. 1. Yaara Winkler, Gilad Schalit's brother's girlfriend, told the audience she was there to share more of the family's story than is found in the film.

She thanked everyone, saying their attendance "means that so many people remember Gilad after five years and in a foreign country, which means the world to me."

The film follows the Schalit family, including Winkler, as they meet with world leaders, among them former U.S. president Jimmy Carter and New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, and talks about the letters and audiotapes they received proving Gilad was alive.

Winkler said what wasn't stressed in the movie was the international pressure they're trying to put on Hamas. She said the family meets frequently with the Red Cross in hopes that this will force Hamas to treat Gilad as a prisoner in accordance with the Geneva Convention, which would lead to regular correspondence with his family, visits by the Red Cross and information about his location.

"The problem is we're not facing a state or any kind of entity that respects international law," she said. "This is a terror organization. They do what they want and they're not seeking anyone's approval."

Winkler spoke about the tent the family erected outside Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's residence at the end of their 11-day walk across Israel. She said people come from all over the world asking to help.

It's important to keep taking action, she said. "It's better for us to sit in the tent with Gilad's shirts than to sit in the living room wondering what more we can do."

The Schalit family all have dual French and Israeli citizenship, Winkler said, so they filed charges in France. Thus, if Hamas leaders want to go to France, they will be arrested. She said this also encouraged France and the European Union to get involved in trying to secure Gilad's release. Despite these efforts, however, they haven't heard anything about Gilad in two years and there hasn't been any progress for some time.

"I wish I had something new to say," Winkler said. "I wish I had something to share with you that could be hopeful."

In exchange for Gilad's release, Hamas wants 1,000 Palestinian prisoners released, some of whom are serving life sentences for murder.

Winkler believes that there need to be some changes before Gilad can be released. "His release has so many other factors that are not directly related to it," she said. "We believe that some bigger things must happen so everything falls into place."

One of these changes could come in September, when Palestine attempts to gain recognition as a state at the United Nations, she said. If Hamas becomes an official Palestinian government, it will be forced to follow international law, which would require Gilad's release.

After the screening, an audience member asked what people can do to help. Winkler said that by attending the screening, they were already helping. It's important to keep doing things to keep Gilad in people's minds, she added.

"Keep on doing that, because then no one will forget him."

Wrong side of history

Last week, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton pleaded with the world to cut commercial and military ties with the ruling regime of Syria. The country's sadistic dictator, Bashar Assad, "has lost the legitimacy to lead," Clinton said. Speaking after a meeting last Friday with Norwegian Foreign Minister Jonas Gahr Store, she added: "We urge those countries still buying Syrian oil and gas, those countries still sending Assad weapons, those countries whose political and economic support give him comfort in his brutality, to get on the right side of history."

Merely hours after Clinton addressed the world, a report was published in the Daily Telegraph that Iran is going to fund the building of a "a multi-million-dollar military base" at the Latakia airport in Syria. Latakia is a vital port city in Syria. The base is expected to be operational by the end of next year and will secure a supply route of weapons, weapons-related materiel and of course, military personnel from the anti-western theocrats of Iran to their anti-western satrap in Syria.

If she had harboured any doubts on the matter prior to the report in the Telegraph, it should be quite obvious to the secretary of state on which side of history the Iranian mullahs prefer to stand. They prefer the dark side, where open government is abhorred and light is not permitted to shine upon the inky, jet-black ways of a regime's enforcers.

Local observers believe more than 1,500 Syrians have been killed since March by Assad. Indeed, on Sunday, he ordered gunboats to fire on the residents of Latakia, killing some 21 more people. Western diplomats believe Iran is actively assisting Assad in the suppression and slaughter of the Syrian demonstrators. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is said to be sending riot control equipment to Assad and sharing intelligence monitoring techniques.

The Telegraph reported that the Iranian-funded military base at the Latakia airport will be manned by teams of Iranian Revolutionary Guard officers. Thus, upon the completion of the base and the stationing of the Iranian officers there, the surrender of Syrian sovereignty to the Shia overlords of Tehran will be complete. And with it, the threat to the region will be imminent and urgent. Iran's access to its Hezbollah surrogates further to the south, in Lebanon, will be much easier and its control over them that much tighter. The Iranian military base in Syria (for that is what it will be), will threaten Israel, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the non-Shia Lebanese.

Dipping his pen in the blood of innocents, Ahmadinejad sits at his desk scheming and writing the history that Clinton and most of the civilized world scorns. To stop his latest sinister scheme, the world must first stop Assad.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israel's cabinet approved a deal worked out with Egypt to send the two countries' dispute over the 25-acre Sinai beachfront of Taba, near Eilat on the Red Sea, to international mediation. Israel had been administering the area, but Egypt claimed it as part of its territory.

A Palestinian state (1)

I fail to recognize the similarity posited by letter writer Peter Silverman between the recognition of Israel in 1948 and the hypothetical recognition of a Palestinian state by the United Nations ("UN recognition of a Palestinian state," July 28). Israel proclaimed its independence on behalf of the Provisional People's Council, pending the election of a government. That's why U.S. President Harry S. Truman issued only de facto recognition after the Declaration of Independence and, as he promised, de jure recognition after the 1949 Israeli election.

The proclamation of Israeli independence was fully justified: the termination of the British Mandate on May 14, 1948, left no doubt as to the ultimate legal sovereignty of the beneficiary, the Jewish people. Sovereignty over Palestine was in abeyance during the Mandatory period, which started in April 1920, when the national rights of the Jewish people to reconstitute their nation were recognized at the San Remo Conference, and the Balfour Declaration thus became an act of international law, leading ultimately to the lawful proclamation of a sovereign Jewish state in Israel. In May 1949, the UN General Assembly, acting on a recommendation by the Security Council, admitted Israel – "a peace-loving state which accepts the obligations contained in the Charter," as a full member of the UN.

So, where is the similarity with the Palestinians? Did the Palestinians proclaim their independence over a defined territory? Would they have a legitimate right to do so? How could any "people" exercise their self-determination over a territory that was internationally recognized as lawfully belonging to another people – the Jewish People – 91 years ago? Could a putative Palestinian state be admitted to the UN as a "peace-loving state which accepts the obligations contained in the Charter," while the official documents of the Palestine Liberation Organization, Fatah and Hamas call for the destruction of Israel, a UN member state?

A Palestinian state (2)

Letter writer Peter Silverman is convinced that UN recognition of a Palestinian state will in some way change the status quo. However the day after this recognition, the Palestinian Authority will still be an independent government with its own legislature, civil service, broadcasting authority, courts, schools, police and militia in a territorial dispute with its neighbour.

Tel Aviv protesters

The headline you gave to Leslie Susser's piece on the Tel Aviv protesters, Susser's own words, is grossly unfair and demeans the protesters and the issues ("Protesters seek return to welfare state," Aug. 11). There are people in Israel who in 2011 live off the "welfare state." They are not camping out on Rothschild Boulevard. They are quite happy with the status quo.

Affordable housing and food are legitimate demands, basic requirements in a society that cares about human decency. Citizens who demand them are not looking for handouts or welfare. One of the glories of the "old Israel" is that society and the government cared about everyone, not just billionaire startups (upstarts?). Food prices came down before yom tov so that all could celebrate with self-respect. The income gap in Israel (or in Canada) is nothing to be proud of. Nor are its byproducts: a failing educational system, children who go to bed hungry, and others in need of the basics.

The Torah teaches concern for the disadvantaged: the widow, the orphan, the stranger. It doesn't denigrate them, and neither should we.

Muslim prayers in public school

The Toronto wing of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) is providing a reasonable response and a rational viewpoint on the accommodation of voluntary prayers in the public school system ("Muslim prayer opponents promise further protests," Aug. 4). This is not a matter of Islamizing the school system. It's a matter of honouring the principle of reasonable religious accommodations without resorting to fear mongering. Those who seek to remove reasonable religious accommodation for members of the Muslim faith should be honest enough to suggest that it be withdrawn for Jews and Christians as well.

This time it must work!

Arie Raif

On the first weekend of August, while watching TV coverage of the massive nationwide protests in Israel, the images of 250,000 people demonstrating peacefully in Tel Aviv had a profound impact on me. Huge crowds had taken to the streets in various cities to express their anger with Israel's social inequity. It was quite moving. There was a direct link between the past and future. A future, I prayed, that would be better than the past and present.

Protests are not new in Israel. In such a highly politicized society, rife with major issues about which everyone seems to have an opinion, demonstrations are a time-honoured tradition. In the 1960 and '70s, as both a private citizen and a politician there, I took part in many. It doesn't take much to get Israelis into the streets to raise their voices. Sometimes the government listens and acts. Not often enough. Until this summer, past protests to correct the inequalities of Israeli life have, at best, had limited success.

'The protests are like a cry from the heart in the name of the entire nation'

This time, in the wake of such a widespread, sustained campaign, it would be nice to believe real change will come. This time, I want to believe the protest must work. This time, it must lead to a shift in Israel's priorities. That's what I said the other day to a visiting relative from Israel, a colonel in the Israel Defence Forces reserves. After all, I told him, facts don't cease to exist just because they're ignored.

The demonstrators have forced Israelis from all walks of life to confront the gnawing injustice of the uneven distribution of the economic and defence burden, and the consequences. It has led many, including myself, to hope that at long last, there will be a change in Israel's priorities.

The protests are like a cry from the heart in the name of the entire nation. Sadly, it still seems largely a dialogue of the deaf as the Netanyahu government has not connected with the demonstrators. Despite paying lip service to the notion of change and appointing a committee to investigate the issues, the government seems unwilling to revise its fundamental social and capitalist perspective. As such, it's a safe bet that most of the demands will not be met.

This time, the oft-repeated, knee-jerk remark of "there is no partner" won't work as it does in the case of making peace with the Palestinians. This time, the people have an elected government supposedly accountable to the people and their demands. This time, the government must explain why it spends more on building Jewish settlements in the occupied territories (2.5 billion shekels annually – $700 million, all figures Cdn) than it does on housing, education and health. Since 1967, when Jewish settlement began in the West Bank and Gaza, the expenditure represents more than 110 billion shekels ($31 billion).

The cost of the IDF holding these disputed territories and protecting the settlers is astronomical. As if that wasn't infuriating enough, Israel's treasury pays one billion shekels ($279 million) every year in "kolel fees" for haredi Jews who do not work. Yet, at the same time, it charges tuition for university students, many if not most of whom have just served two to three years in the IDF as part of their military service. For Israel's politicians, studying the Gemara would appear to be more important than studying engineering, medicine, economics and literature. How else to explain that successive governments (left and right) have consented to the kolel fee (payment to yeshiva students) being higher than the salary a soldier receives for doing his/her mandatory IDF service. At the kolel, each student receives about 900 shekels ($252) per month, while a soldier receives only 350 ($98) to 700 shekels ($196) per month. Not surprisingly, this is extremely disturbing to many Israelis, especially to those who serve and risk their lives defending the country and receive less money than the haredi who evade the draft.

On the economic front, due to misguided coalition policies, the workforce in Israel stands at only 57 per cent, compared to much higher rates in most other countries. This major difference helps explain the significant contrast in the standard of living. If Israel's workforce would be at 75 per cent, there would be nearly four million people employed instead of the current three million. The per capita GDP of $30,000 would rise to $35,000, and the middle class could finish the month without requiring an overdraft at the bank.

The yoke of occupation costs Israel billions of shekels. When compared to the GDP, the country's defence budget is the highest in the world and constitutes about 25 per cent of the state budget. Somehow it's accepted year after year. Why hasn't the government implemented the two-state solution with the Palestinians, saving billions of shekels in the process?

Why, according to Tax Authority figures, is the pharmaceutical giant Teva's corporate tax rate practically zero? In 2008, the four biggest exporters – Teva, Israel Chemicals, Iscar and one of the high-tech giants, the top one per cent of Israeli exporters – paid a corporate tax rate of 7.2 per cent. By comparison, smaller exporters had to pay a corporate tax of 12 to 16 per cent. Altogether, 72 per cent of the 5.6 billion shekels ($1.5 billion) in tax breaks went to the four big exporters.

How is it that in a supposedly market economy, the government allows monopolies and cartels to impose high import tariffs on food, which prevent competition and cause high prices that make it particularly difficult for the middle class and poor.

The government's plan to reduce corporate tax from 24 to 18 per cent means that the ones that pay the most corporate tax are banks, insurance companies, the biggest industrial concerns, the retail giants and the mobile phone operators. (They can't get up and go elsewhere anyway). Under such a scenario, the state gives up a source of income when such tax revenue could be used to make Israeli society more equitable. Last week, the Jerusalem Institute for Market Studies reported that Israelis pay 75 per cent more tax on housing than citizens of other Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) countries. Why?

The answers are that Israel's social fabric has been destroyed over the past 44 years since the Six Day War as governments (left and right) obfuscated about how much they were really spending on the settlements. At the same time, they fed public fears about "the security threats" that would result if Israel gave up the West Bank. The various governments' real priority, however, was how to stay in power by preserving the ruling coalition cobbled together after each election. Of course, the price paid to keep these improbable, sometimes dysfunctional coalitions intact translated into billions of shekels to buy the co-operation of coalition members.

This summer, the government faces a huge challenge. This time, it will not easily distract the public from the current struggle to change social and economic priorities. It ignores this social movement at its own peril and to the lasting detriment of Israel.

My fervent hope is that ultimately new political forces will emerge that will finally eradicate once and for all the dubious electoral system that has brought so much evil to Israel and its people.

Cotler stands his ground and makes key distinctions

The official Canada Day celebration in Jerusalem offered yet another opportunity to celebrate the increasingly warm relations between Israel and Canada. The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) hosted a lovely reception on the Israel Museum's terrace. The speeches and the signing ceremony between Ambassador Paul Hunt and Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman enacting the latest bilateral agreement encouraging Canadian-Israeli research and development celebrated Israel's and Canada's common commitments to innovation, democracy, freedom and multicultural tolerance.

Gil Troy

in Montreal

Clearly, there is a multipartisan commitment in both countries to warm Canadian-Israel relations. Speakers from Israel's ruling coalition and opposition praised Canada's Prime Minister Stephen Harper for defending Israel, courageously and altruistically. And among the half-dozen Canadian parliamentarians from different parties attending, Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler was singled out, honouring all he has done to unite the two countries.

In a less pleasant but equally significant indicator of what the two countries have in common, Cotler was distracted this summer by an Israeli media version of a "hit and run." In an interview, an aggressive reporter from Israel's leftist Ha'aretz newspaper asked repeatedly where Cotler draws the line in condemning harsh anti-Israel attacks. Then, characteristically, the reporter ran with a story that distorted the main theme in a speech Cotler gave denouncing the delegitimization of Israel.

As a result, a misleading Ha'aretz headline on July 1 ruined Cotler's Canada Day by proclaiming: "Canadian MP Cotler: Calling Israel an apartheid state can be legitimate free speech." The newspaper implicitly charged: "Pro-Israel advocate OKs calling Israel an apartheid state." Anyone who knows Cotler – and who heard or read his remarks – knows that his theme was exactly the opposite. Even a selective headline focusing on his answer to the reporter's question, rather than the speech, should have been a boring restatement of freedom of expression 101: "Legendary McGill law professor supports free speech, even for ideas we hate."

Cotler has been an indefatigable opponent of the dastardly attempt to delegitimize Israel. He has spearheaded efforts among academics and parliamentarians to combat the "new antisemitism," which targets Israel, treating it as the "Jew among the nations," and singling out only one form of nationalism, Jewish nationalism, meaning Zionism, as racist. A co-founder of the Inter-Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Anti-Semitism, Cotler hosted 140 parliamentarians from more than 50 countries in Ottawa this November at the group's second international conference. And this summer, the Canadian parliamentary inquiry he participated that assessed the new antisemitism in Canada released its sobering analysis.

In a letter to Ha'aretz's editor printed on July 4, Cotler stated his position clearly, saying that "the indictment of Israel as an apartheid state is false, defamatory and hateful, but the right to be wrong, defamatory and hateful – however offensive it may be – can nevertheless be an exercise in free speech." He added, characteristically, that it is our responsibility to "'delegitimize the delegitimizers,' to expose, unmask and combat this libel."

Cotler finds comparing the national conflict between Israelis and Palestinians to the racism of the old South African regime's oppressive color-based legal codes particularly odious because he fought apartheid years before opposing it was trendy.

Ha'aretz also obscured Cotler's main point these days – that the delegitimization of Israel is being masked, or as he calls it "laundered," with a hateful campaign to eliminate the Jewish state hidden in clouds of high-minded rhetoric fighting racism, supporting international law, advancing human rights, and, yes, condemning apartheid. This approach is doubly demeaning, tarring Israel and undermining democratic values.

"The result," Cotler wrote, "is not only prejudicial to the State of Israel – as in the indictment of Israel as an apartheid state or the singling out of Israel for differential and discriminatory treatment in the international arena – but prejudicial to the case and cause of the struggle against racism and human rights."

Surprisingly, the lovely reception celebrating the Israel-Canada bond and this journalistic brouhaha are mutually reinforcing moments. Both are characteristically democratic acts that reflect the ideological bedrock uniting these two members of a rather exclusive worldwide club.

Soirees marking national days are more elegant and more fun. But the messy business of drawing lines, making distinctions, defining rights, and warning when the right values are being used for wrong purposes is equally important, exemplifying the kinds of important, challenging and democratically defining activities taking place in Israel and Canada every day.

Casa Hillel kids come to Canada

A few months ago, I wrote about my experience in Guatemala with Casa Hillel, a unique group of indigenous Guatemalans who have chosen to convert to Judaism. There are six children involved, ranging in age from 11 to 18, all of whom converted in the last five years with their parents. When our Toronto Prosserman JCC Kolel "voluntour" left Guatemala last April, we knew we wanted to bring those six kids to Canada for a Jewish summer camp experience to strengthen their Jewish identity, help them understand Jewish ritual and history, and develop a love for Israel.

In May, miracle after miracle occurred. A generous donation in memory of Clara and David Nightingale, members of the Reform Jewish community for over 60 years, made this dream possible. Their love of Judaism and desire to help those in need inspired this gift.

We met with several impressive sleepover Jewish camps and had trouble deciding, since all were so good. Finally we decided upon Camp Gesher, although later this month, the kids will have the opportunity to attend Toronto's own fantastic Centre Camp. The parents of the younger kids had to be convinced to let them travel across the world to a place they have never imagined. The kids had to get school time off, since they go to school in August. We had to find a Jewish Spanish-English speaking counsellor who would volunteer at camp for one session. Finally, the embassy had to grant visas to the group.

We waited breathlessly day after day to hear that all had gone through well. It felt like forever. Shabbat was quickly approaching, and they were supposed to come that Sunday. With the help of our amazing partners – Michael Ettedgui and Yaldeinu, Shaul Zobary and Camp Gesher, Adrienne Rosen and Access Education (our partner in the voluntour) and travel agent Michal Shenkar of Payless Travel – we were somehow able to move many last-minute mountains, and on Sunday, July 24, as hoped, all six kids arrived.

After much hugging, the kids gathered around me and asked to say a blessing they had prepared. In a circle of teenagers, all of whom have chosen Judaism, a grateful Shehechiyanu was led by the kids themselves, right at the airport. They cried, and believe me, so did I.

Thus began several days of deep and constant gratitude like I have never experienced before. Thank you for this snack. Thanks for driving us to our next event. Thank you for breakfast. Thank you for this amazing day. Every dish was cleared and washed, counters scrubbed, beds made, bags carried, doors opened. Without asking! Hugs were exchanged freely and with true warmth.

I took them to Holy Blossom Temple to see a large synagogue. They cried again upon entering the sanctuary. They couldn't imagine so many Jews in one place. They'd never seen a hybrid car and were amazed at the dashboard. They couldn't get over my GPS and took pictures of it. They don't have dishwashers at home. They went to wash the dinner dishes, and I told them to just stack them in the dishwasher. After dutifully doing so, they asked, "Do we take them out now and wash them?"

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

After a full day of exploring Toronto and the CN Tower (they didn't need the movie, the ride or other extras – they were thrilled with the elevator itself!) they took a three-hour English lesson, following every word and absorbing it all – and thanking the teacher afterward. They were astounded at Toronto's Prosserman JCC – its beauty and newness and all the Jewish classes and events a person can experience there. In my office, they touched the Talmuds and siddurim and other sacred books lining my shelves and gasped. I blessed them as they each reached out to touch a Torah with eyes closed and held breath.

They take nothing for granted. They're not jaded, spoiled or "entitled." They love being Jewish and treasure it as a gift of immeasurable value. They're extraordinary in a North American context. Let's hope that the strongest image the Casa Hillel kids take home is not our phenomenal and unrecognized privilege. Perhaps some of our Toronto teens should spend a summer in Guatemala to relearn the art of gratitude, appreciation, wonder and awe?

The Eichmann trial in retrospect

Criminal case 40/61, as it was innocuously called, began 50 years ago on April 11 in Jerusalem. It may have been the trial of the 20th century. The defendant was Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann, who played a decisive role in the Holocaust.

Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, is marking the 50th anniversary of this seminal trial with an exhibition scheduled to run until the end of 2011. The exhibition consists of photographs, newspaper clippings and artifacts. They come from Yad Vashem's collections, the National Archive and the National Photo Archives.

Eichmann, who was executed in the spring of 1961 after being found guilty of crimes against humanity, is presented as a fugitive in hiding in Argentina and as the accused in the glass booth, where the celebrated trial took place.

The surveillance photographs of Eichmann in Buenos Aires, taken by Mossad agents tailing him, are telling. After escaping from Germany with the aid of former SS officers and the Catholic Church, Eichmann, a Red Cross passport in hand, arrived in Argentina under the pseudonym of Ricardo Klement.

As the historian Deborah Lipstadt writes in her newly published book, The Eichmann Trial (Random House Canada), Eichmann's cover was blown by three individuals: Lothar Hermann, a nearly blind German half-Jew who immigrated to Argentina in 1939; his teenage daughter, Sylvia, who knew nothing of her Jewish heritage and who dated Eichmann's son, Klaus, and Fritz Bauer, a Jewish lawyer from Stuttgart who spent the war years in Denmark and Sweden, returned to Germany and accepted a position as the attorney general of the state of Hesse.

Convinced that Klement was, in fact, Eichmann, Hermann sent his information to the German government. He bypassed the German Embassy in Buenos Aires, having been informed that it was staffed by former Nazis. Hermann's letter landed on Bauer's desk. Bauer did not consult his colleagues in the judicial system, suspecting they might harbour Nazi sympathies. Instead, he contacted Israel's security services. But the director of the Mossad, Isser Harel, sat on the data for four months before asking an Israeli agent in Argentina to check it out.

Having walked through Klement's dilapidated neighbourhood, the agent told Harel it could not be home to a former high-ranking Nazi official. Harel dropped the matter. Infuriated by Harel's lackadaisical attitude, Bauer lodged a complaint with Israel's attorney general, who persuaded Harel to dispatch a senior Mossad operative to Buenos Aires. He confirmed that Klement was Eichmann.

Sheldon Kirshner in Jerusalem

Eichmann was abducted by a team of Mossad agents, driven to a safe house and interrogated. He was flown out of Argentina, having been drugged and dressed in an El Al uniform.

At the Yad Vashem exhibition, there are two items of note. A photograph shows Eichmann, his eyes blindfolded, being escorted to the aircraft. A letter he signed states he is willing to face the music in Israel: "I wish finally to find peace of mind again."

Following his arrival in Israel, Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion made a dramatic announcement in the Knesset on May 23, 1960: "Adolf Eichmann is already under arrest... and will be placed on trial shortly," he declared.

Photographs at the exhibition show an Israeli judge issuing an arrest warrant against Eichmann and Eichmann in his prison cell. Eichmann's personal effects – Argentine currency, an ID card, eyeglasses, a red wallet and notes to himself in German – are displayed under glass.

After the story of Eichmann's abduction broke, Ben-Gurion wrote a conciliatory letter to Argentina's president in an attempt to explain Israel's actions. His trial, Ben-Gurion explained, would be "an act of supreme historic justice."

Argentina, however, demanded Eichmann's return and brought the matter to the United Nations' Security Council. The upshot of the affair was that Israel's foreign minister, Golda Meir, apologized for the kidnapping. By August, Israel and Argentina had resolved the problem, says Lipstadt in her first-class book.

But Israel still had to contend with sharp criticism emanating from the United States. The Washington Post condemned Israel's "jungle law" and predicted that Eichmann's trial would be "tainted with lawlessness. Time, meanwhile, accused Israel of violating international law.

Before his trial, Eichmann was interrogated at length by Avner Less, a German Jew who had immigrated to Palestine in 1938. Eichmann spoke freely, but refused to acknowledge personal guilt, claiming he was just a "little cog" and "exclusively a carrier out of orders." If he was guilty of anything, he observed, it was of being too loyal to Germany.

During his trial, Eichmann reiterated these views. In a video at the exhibition, he says, "I was merely a cog in the machinery that carried out the directives of the German Reich."

But Eichmann was more than a powerless functionary, Lipstadt points out. Though he did not dip his hands in Jewish blood, he co-ordinated the deportation of about 1.5 million Jews to death camps. He was particularly effective in Hungary, having sent 440,000 Jews to Auschwitz in the space of less than two months in 1944, as the prosecutor, Gideon Hausner, said.

Eichmann's German lawyer, Robert Servatius, who had never been a member of the Nazi party, argued that the court lacked jurisdiction because his crimes were committed prior to Israel's existence, on foreign soil and against people who had no connection to Israel. And he challenged the judges themselves, saying that, as Jews, they could not be impartial. Servatius, too, said that his client's antisemitism was no different from that of respectable and distinguished segments of German society.

Adolf Eichmann in his Nazi uniform.

Eichmann – who briefly visited Palestine in 1937 before being thrown out by the British authorities – addressed this issue in his trial. "I had no innate hatred of Jews," he claimed.

Lipstadt begs to differ. Although she admits that antisemitism may not have been a factor in his decision to join the Nazi party, she says that the issue was hardly irrelevant. Eichmann, though born in Germany, was raised in Austria. "Antisemitism was rife in Austria, and few people were immune from it," she says.

Assessing the impact of the trial, Lipstadt says it raised Holocaust consciousness in Israel, cemented the word "Holocaust" into the world's lexicon, accelerated the growth of Holocaust studies, sped up the prosecution of Nazi war criminals in Germany and reinforced the notion that there is "universal jurisdiction" over genocide.

In short, the Eichmann trial was a landmark event, as Yad Vashem's exhibition and Lipstadt's book both indicate.

Jewish and Arab teenagers enjoyed the camp experience at Camp Shomria

Jewish and Arab teens have fun at camp

Laura Fixman
Intern

Eighteen Jewish and Arab Israeli teens got to enjoy a North American camp experience for three weeks this summer.

The Grade 9 students came to Camp Shomria in Perth, Ont., about an hour's drive south of Ottawa, as part of a new Heart to Heart program for students who have been in the Children Teaching Children program at the Givat Haviva Educational Foundation in central Israel.

Children Teaching Children provides an opportunity for Jewish and Arab middle school-aged students in Israel to face "complex issues of national and individual identity, community life and conflicting narratives in a shared land," the Givat Haviva website says.

Eyal Rosenblum, the Heart to Heart liaison between Shomria and Givat Haviva, said the program was more successful than he had anticipated.

The students "just blended into the camp, and once they got there, they really wanted to take part in all the activities," he said. "It was almost too easy."

Rosenblum said one reason for the program's success was that there was a lot of preparation beforehand.

Givat Haviva has sent kids to Camp Shomria in Liberty, N.Y., for 10 years, he said, but the idea of sending them to Canada was first proposed in February. Between then and the time the teens arrived at camp on July 17, both they and their counsellors were well prepared for what to expect.

Sending the students to a North American camp is beneficial for everyone involved, Rosenblum said.

"When you live in the same village or town your whole life, you're bound to feel tension, and it doesn't give you time to think or reflect," he said. "We wanted to give them space to just be together."

The Heart to Heart participants spent a day in Ottawa, where they toured the Parliament Buildings and visited the Canadian Museum of Civilization. They were also in Toronto for a few days, where they went to the top of the CN Tower and spent what Rosenblum felt was too much time in the Eaton's Centre.

They ended their stay in Toronto with a reception in their honour at the Multi-Faith Centre in Koffler House at the University of Toronto. During the reception, several of the Israelis spoke about what a great experience they'd had at camp and how thankful they were for the opportunity.

"It was amazing. It was just like a kibbutz, but in Canada," one of the students, Roni Zweigenbeig, said. "The food was also delicious."

Rosenblum said it was the simple things that made the experience memorable for him.

"Just having Arab boys and Jewish boys sharing a cabin together was amazing to see," he said. "Most of them had never seen a lake before, so seeing their reactions when they saw the lake and seeing them learn to swim for the first time were among the best parts for me."

Shay, one of the participants, said her favourite part of camp was her madrichim (counsellors).

Rosenblum agreed that the leaders are an important part of the program's success. "Before anything else, the [Israelis] felt that connection to the counsellors," he said. "It was a life-changing experience for the kids, but it was just as life-changing for the counsellors."

Birthright celebrates 11 years of free trips to Israel

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Nearly 800 Birthright alumni and hopeful participants gathered on Thursday in Toronto to celebrate 11 years of changing lives.

The Mega Event, presented by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Magen Boys Entertainment, celebrated the fact that since 1999, nearly 300,000 young Jewish adults have travelled to Israel with Taglit-Birthright Israel to learn about their homeland for free.

Dean Medina, outreach co-ordinator for UJA's Community Connect and one of the co-chairs of the Mega Event, said that the hundreds of Jewish youth who packed The Warehouse Thursday night, as well as the money that was raised to support more Birthright initiatives, exceeded his expectations.

Although it's too soon to calculate the grand total of funds raised, Medina said he's confident the grand total surpassed their initial goal.

"Israelis, Birthright alumni, non-Birthright alumni, literally young adults from all corners of the Toronto Jewish community came together to celebrate not only over 10 years of Birthright Israel's existence, but the strength and pride of our Jewish community," Medina said.

Throughout the night, party-goers were treated to performances by DJ Skratch Bastid, as well as Bongo & B Ent., a drumming company.

"We had some amazing hand drummers by Peter B and Marko Bongo, and they started getting everyone going with a choreographed drumming session," Medina said.

Later in the night, two Air Canada flights to Israel were raffled off.

Medina added that if not for UJA's support, the party would not have been the success it was.

"[UJA] believed in this project, and as a result we were able to throw what was probably the biggest Jewish party for young adults ever in the history of Toronto."

Kicking off the celebration was a private reception called From Founders to Future. It was held in honour of Birthright co-founder Charles Bronfman, who was also celebrating his recent 80th birthday.

Chaia Nadal, Birthright Israel Foundation of Canada's director of development, said that the reception, which included speeches by Bronfman and Toronto's consul general of Israel, Amir Gissin, was meant to honour three generations of community supporters and volunteers – Birthright alumni, their parents and grandparents.

Speaking to a crowd of about 150 people, Gissin said that Birthright is not just a life-changing experience for Diapora Jews who travel to Israel, as it also deeply affects the Israeli soldiers who travel with the groups and forge relationships with "their peers, their extended family in the Diaspora.

"When soldiers are on the bus for 10 days with kids their age, who are being exposed to Israel for the first time, the kind of friendship and understanding that is being created is amazing and it affects Israeli society in a very significant way," Gissin said.

Bronfman, who credited Birthright alumni and volunteers for the ongoing success of the program, said, "When people ask [co-founder] Mike Steinhardt and I, 'Has this exceeded your expectations?' I say, 'It's exceeded our wildest dreams.'"

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Labour Day: a Jewish holiday

Rabbi Aaron Levy

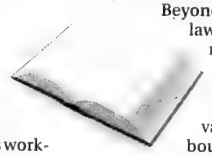
A recent front-page article in the National Post brought attention to the claim currently before the Ontario Labour Relations Board that the Kashruth Council of Canada hasn't been paying its mashgichim overtime, as mandated by provincial law. While COR disputes the charge, the case impels us to consider what Jewish law and values teach us about employer-employee relationships.

Of course, like all matters in Judaism, this is a complex and lengthy topic, so we'll just barely skim the surface of a few traditional texts in the space of this column (and we won't touch on the history of Jewish involvement in modern labour movements).

In the fourth of the Ten Commandments, just as Jews are bidden to observe Shabbat by refraining from work, so too are their employees "so that your male and female servant may rest as you do" (Deuteronomy 5:14). Every person, Jewish or not and regardless of socio-economic status, must be given respite from work for one day each week, for we don't live to work, but rather work in order to live.

The Torah also forbids withholding the wages of a day labourer: "You must pay him his wages on the same day, before the sun sets, for he is needy and his life depends on it" (Deuteronomy 24:15). The Babylonian Talmud further develops this law into the requirement that all employees must be paid on time and offers a bold interpretation of the biblical verse: "'His life depends on it' – Anyone who withholds a labourer's wages is like one who takes his life from him" (Bava Metzia 112a).

Rabbinic Reflections



The Mishnah regulates working hours and benefits: "One who hires workers and tells them to start early or stay late, in a place where the custom is not to start early or stay late, the employer may not coerce them. In a place where the custom is to feed the workers – the employer must feed them, to provide sweets – the employer must provide sweets. Everything goes according to the custom of the land [minhag hamedinah]" (Bava Metzia 7:1). Prevailing norms of employment – even in seemingly trivial matters – must be upheld so that employers can't incrementally degrade working conditions and create a race to the bottom for their employees.

The talmudic dictum "dina d'malchuta dina" – "the law of the land is the law," means that secular law becomes ensconced as Halachah (Jewish law). Contemporary labour laws –federal, provincial or municipal – certainly fall under this rubric, so adhering to them is, therefore, doubly mandated – by government and by Judaism.

Beyond the various Jewish laws regarding the treatment of employees, the Talmud offers an anecdote that illustrates the broader value accorded to labour in Judaism. "Rabbi Judah used to go into the beit midrash carrying a pitcher on his shoulders and would say: 'Great is work, for it honours the worker'" (Nedarim 49b).

As we approach Labour Day, let's each ensure that all our businesses, communal organizations and personal hires follow civil and Jewish employment law in both letter and spirit, and that we truly honour workers.

Finding each other in Elul

The month of August signifies the midpoint of the summer, and that soon we will be entering the fall season. Everything around us is preparing for the changing circumstances in nature between summer and fall. Interestingly, this reflects what's happening in the Jewish calendar as well.

The end of the month of August is also the beginning of the Hebrew month of Elul. This is an important month in Judaism, since it signifies the last month before the High Holidays.

During the month of Elul, it's customary to blow the shofar on weekdays after Shacharit. It's also customary to assess our behaviour over the past year and seek out those people who deserve an apology from us.

In fact, the name of the month Elul in Aramaic means "search," which is certainly the prime activity of the month. We often think that it's about searching ourselves internally and honestly confronting who we have been.

It's about searching our hearts and searching our souls. In fact, Maimonides says that the shofar blast is to awaken us to begin the search.

Midrashic Moments

Rachel Turkienicz

But the sages of the Talmud add another interesting layer. According to the rabbis, God is never the problem. As a forgiving parent, God will and does grant us unconditional forgiveness. When we have done something wrong and we approach our parents with the apology, we will most often be forgiven. The problem occurs if we have hurt someone else.

As children, if we hit a sibling and go to our parent with the apology, the parent will correctly teach us that we must first apologize to our sibling for the hurt we caused. But then we must also apologize to our parents, because when we hurt a sibling we also hurt them. Parents suffer when their children suffer.

So the rabbis teach us in the midrash that the search of Elul is to seek and find those people whom we have hurt. We must approach the High Holidays having done our due diligence.

On several occasions, the sages have explained Yom Kippur this way: "Matters between you and God, who is everywhere, can be forgiven you. Matters between you and your fellow human beings will not be forgiven until you conciliate them."

While we search ourselves, we identify who we must seek out on Elul.

Roman Israel: age of transition, Pt. 1

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

The Romans ruled Israel for more than 700 years, from 63 BCE until 638 CE, and left a lasting impression on the land. Some of Israel's most magnificent ruins date from this period, including the remains of the Second Temple, Masada and Caesarea Maritima, to name just a few.

It's partially this legacy that led me to support the Jewish-Italian Friendship Initiative and to choose as its ongoing project a new excavation at Tel Huqoq in Israel, which is co-sponsored by the University of Toronto's Archaeology Centre and the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies.

This project will give us new insights into daily life in the Galilee during this crucial period in Jewish history, one that saw important developments in our evolution. There's no doubt that Roman rule was an inescapable factor in Jewish life during this time. It was also a period that saw a Jewish sect rise from obscurity to become the official religion of the Roman Empire – Christianity.

With this legacy in mind, I'm organizing a tour that will take participants to key sites of this important phase of our history, especially Tel Huqoq, where excavators will give us a unique, behind-the-scenes look at an important dig. The tour will focus on the Roman impact on Israel as it made the transition from ancient times into the Middle Ages. In the process, the Romans left Israel with some of the most visible monuments of its long history.

Although Roman ruins are found throughout the land, we find some of the most imposing ones along the coast. Caesarea Maritima, as its name implies, was built on the Mediterranean by a man who looms large for the magnificence of his grandiose buildings, as well as for the depth of his tyranny and brutality. That man was Herod the Great.

Herod built Caesarea to honour his patron, Caesar Augustus, and Caesarea lives up to its imperial name. He spared no expense in building his new port city. It used the latest Roman building techniques, such as quick-drying cement, for its artificial harbour, which was even larger than Athens' harbour of Piraeus.

Up the coast from Caesarea are the remains of Tel Dor, which Caesarea replaced as the main harbour along the coast of Israel. Outside of archeologists, Dor is a little-known site with monuments as impressive as its history. It's one of the most scenic sites along the coast, with a lovely lagoon beside the ruins overlooked by the ghostly column bases of what was once a magnificent Greco-Roman temple.

Heading inland, we enter the Galilee, the hotbed of ideas and revolutionary movements during much of the Roman period. Here we come upon Sepphoris, or Zippori as it is called in Hebrew. Although it was destroyed by the Roman legate Varus, the city was rebuilt on a much grander scale and would become an important centre of Jewish learning, culminating in Judah Hanasi's compilation of the Mishnah. (To be continued.)

Jewish homeschooling, Part 1

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

The days are getting shorter, and kids will soon be heading off to school. For most, that means a daily trip by bus, carpool or even by foot. But for a select group of Jewish students, the classroom is as far away as their den or bedroom and their teachers are their parents. Some Jewish families opt for homeschooling because of geographical or philosophical needs. Here's a sampling of comments from supporters and critics.

"Children can go at whatever pace works best for them," says Martine Porter-Zasada, who has homeschooled her four children. "Siblings can grow up together and be best friends, and children can have their parents in their lives longer. They can truly grow up in the slow lane." [http://bit.ly/hmsch1]

"My children see their friends almost every afternoon. They aren't busy with homework, after all... We are part of a strong community through our shul, and the children are friends with kids of various ages from different schools." –Lisa. [http://bit.ly/hmsch5]

"I sense that some of the parents trapped in the yeshiva system of schooldays that run six days a week until almost dinner envy our freedom. And it is not a freedom I would easily give up. Actually, the nicest thing is something my husband learned when he was homeschooled – that learning is a function of effort, not time." –Anonymous. [http://bit.ly/hmsch13]

Not everyone agrees. "Learning has a multiplier effect when it takes place in groups... You know the line that's been popularized: 'Does not get along well with others.' Well, if you have no experience getting along with others, it's hard to do it." –Richard Wagner of Ben Porat Yosef Sephardic Yeshiva in Bergen County, N.J. [http://bit.ly/hmsch12]

Jews "are a tribe, a religion, a social entity. We count minyans. We are by definition people who educate in groups... Talmud and midrash aren't monologues. They aren't even dialogues. They're a plurality of voices crossing intellectual abilities, space and time." –Rabbi Henry Shreibman of Brandeis Hillel Day School in San Francisco. [http://bit.ly/hmsch14]

From the Israeli report, "Homeschooling as a Fundamental Change in Lifestyle":

• Homeschooling allows parents... to re-experience and better cope with their own difficult experiences, as well as allowing parents to invest in their children at a level that they themselves would have liked to receive but did not.

• Homeschooling is perceived as rescuing the child from regressing emotionally and ethically or morally, which is what occurs when he or she encounters the conventional school system. [http://bit.ly/hmsch15]

Barry Koff has an interesting perspective. He has taught Hebrew and Judaic studies at a Jewish school and to his twins at home. "Homeschooling is not for everyone... But for us, as evidenced by my son's smile and enthusiasm and my daughter's energy and anticipation, it has made all the difference. I can recite for the first time, with commitment and sense of purpose, the second paragraph of Judaism's defining prayer, the Shema: 'Teach them faithfully to your children; speak of them in your home and on your way, when you lie down and when you rise up.'" [http://bit.ly/hmsch16]

Turkey could do more to pressure Assad

As Syrian president Bashar Assad continues to defy the international community over his refusal to stop slaughtering his own civilians in order to preserve his rule, and likely the lives of his minority Alawite sect, the media are focused increasingly on the situation throughout the country. And they're doing so despite having to report, with rare exceptions, from outside Syria.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Then again, Syria was never an easy country to report from, even when journalists were granted visas. Reporters have always been tightly controlled by the Assad family over the last 40 years (under Hafez Assad and now his son, Bashar). With rare exceptions, journalists reported basically what the regime wanted them to see, even during so-called "liberalizing" periods, which have turned out to be hollow. These included efforts to portray Bashar Assad as a "reformer," a dose of nonsense swallowed until not long ago by senior U.S. politicians and administration officials, including Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

Now, thanks to the availability of cellphone images, the brutal truth of what is happening cannot be suppressed, despite the fact the regime has repeatedly shut down the Internet.

The stubborn persistence of the truth may be the key factor in finally moving the United Nations Security Council from its hypocritical silence to at least endorse a U.S. presidential condemnation of Syria over its reign of terror. (The council could not muster the will to issue its own resolution to that effect.) The truth may also be what prompted the rare charge last week from King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia to Assad to stop "the killing machine and end the bloodshed."

An Aug. 9 New York Times editorial noted Abdullah's statement, along with the withdrawals of Saudi, Kuwaiti, and Bahranian ambassadors from Damascus, and criticisms (albeit tepid) of Syria, finally, from the Arab League and the Gulf Cooperation Council. At least the Times put it correctly: "The fact that they waited so long is a disgrace." The Times also accurately observed that the countries rebuking Syria are themselves "repressive autocracies" that had until now supported Syria "as too powerful and too important to cross."

That view is nonsense. Syria is both terribly weak, economically and politically, and it has long been – through its increasing dependence on Iran and support of Hamas and Hezbollah – a source of regional instability.

Bashar Assad

The fact that Turkey until very recently was strongly supportive of Syria (and Iran) reveals the nature and disposition of a government that many in the West prefer to see as progressive, blending Islam and democracy. (On a related point, note that Turkey has the unenviable record of imprisoning more journalists than even Iran.) Only when thousands of Syrian refugees flooded across the Turkish border seeking a safe haven from Syrian forces did Turkey muster the will to call Assad's murderous rampage "unacceptable."

Some media reports last week seemed to indicate that Turkey stood the best chance of prevailing upon Assad to change course. Here's how a Washington Post correspondent described Turkey's diplomatic intervention:

"The violence has strained Syria's close relationship with Turkey, the country considered most likely to wield influence over Assad. Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu emerged seemingly empty-handed from a six-hour meeting with Assad on [Aug. 9] in Damascus, after issuing what the Turkish media called an ultimatum to stop the killing.

"Davutoglu said only that the encounter was 'friendly' and that he expected to see 'concrete steps' in the coming days to end the violence."

For Davutoglu to term his meeting with a murderous dictator "friendly" may appear more pathetic than generous. It's certainly not language that suggests an ultimatum.

Turkey has made some noise of late that it may yet impose sanctions on the Syrian regime. But that remains to be seen. Until it does, Turkey's reprimands will remain more theatre than substance.

Fund helps Jewish seniors in need

Compiled by CJN Staff

Although August is still part of the summer holidays, it's also the time we begin to realize that the High Holidays will soon be here. But for some Jewish seniors, holiday time is not about celebration and family. Instead, it's a period of privation.

Thanks to the generosity of Harry Enchin, and with matching funds from the Weinberg Foundation, (a U.S.-based charitable foundation), 36 Toronto seniors have been able to celebrate the holidays as others do over the last three years.

Harry Enchin conceived of and established the Jonathan Enchin Community Fund in 2008, in memory of his brother Jonathan. It was established as a three-year pilot project to ease the effects of poverty among Toronto's Jewish seniors and help them to live more "Jewishly."

Seniors with an annual income below $20,000 who pay market rent are eligible for assistance. They receive $1,240 each per year. These recipients are among the Toronto Jewish community's most impoverished and vulnerable population. Stipends are paid to each household in quarterly instalments, timed so that participants receive cheques at least one week prior to major Jewish holidays.

Funds are used at the discretion of the recipients. Some use them for High Holiday tickets, some pay for food or non-subsidized medications or health supplies. Others have been able to reduce their isolation by becoming members of the Bernard Betel Centre and participating in its programs.

The program is administered by the Kehilla Residential Programme, an affiliated agency of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Recipients are referred to Kehilla from Jewish Family & Child, Circle of Care, the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

Although the stipend is small compared to the need, the recipients' comments attest to the impact it has had on the quality of their lives. An elderly woman called the money "a miracle," and added that she was "thankful that Jewish people are helping me."

Kehilla was told repeatedly that "every penny counts."

One family sends a thank-you note at every Jewish holiday. The statistical evidence of the program's achievements can never be as meaningful as these unsolicited words of thanks, the fund's organizers say.

The three-year pilot project has ended. The challenge facing seniors this Rosh Hashanah is for the fund to achieve sustainability so that current recipients are assured of help over the long term and the benefit can be extended to more people in need.

That's where we come in. We can make a difference in the Jewish lives of our community's most vulnerable seniors by supporting this program. All donations are fully tax deductible and go directly to those in need. For additional information or to make a contribution, please contact Kehilla at 416-932-1212 or make a secure donation online at www.kehilla.ca.

IDFWO group helps Israeli kids connect

"To be with another 37 guys that the same thing happened to helps a lot," Ro'i said.

He said that on this trip, he felt free to talk about his experience.

"I can't talk about it with my other friends because they don't understand. That's the most amazing thing about this trip. You can talk about anything with them because we are not afraid."

He said it hasn't been hard for him to talk "because I'm very open about the subject. I'm proud of my father."

Twelve-year-old Dan Masad, who said he became best friends with Ro'i on the trip, is the youngest son of Tamir Masad, one of three IDF soldiers killed in a suicide bombing at a gas station at the entrance to Ariel in Samaria in 2002.

Tamir, who had been called up for reserve duty and had just completed three days of training, spotted the bomber and reportedly ran toward him to prevent him from detonating the bomb.

But the terrorist was shot, causing the bomb to go off, and Tamir, who was standing nearby, was killed.

Dan, who was four years old when his father died, said, "I didn't really understand what it meant. I'm happy that I remember him. A lot of kids here don't remember their fathers because they were babies, but I have memories."

Dan's two older brothers have gone on past IDFWO summer trips, but he said he was reluctant to go.

"I didn't really like [the idea]. I didn't really want to do it. My brothers told me to go. They recommended it."

But, he added, after the first meeting in Israel prior to the group's departure, he knew he'd make a lot of new friends.

"I also feel like I've grown up a little bit, and I have more independence, being without my family," he said.

Dan, just months away from his bar mitzvah, is now looking forward to celebrating with a group of IDFWO bar and bat mitzvah children.

The bar/bat mitzvah program includes a visit with Israeli President Shimon Peres, a ceremony at the Kotel (Western Wall), and a reception attended by the minister of defence and the chief of staff.

Shoham-Solan, who has been volunteering with the 20-year-old organization for the past four years and has just been re-elected for another four, said she can relate to Dan's initial reluctance to become a part of the group.

A widow herself, Shoham-Solan lost her husband in 1982 in Lebanon.

"When I lost my husband, I didn't want to belong to any group because it was too hard for me to recognize myself as a widow. I didn't want to remove my ring, I didn't want to belong to any widows group," she recalled. But she has since realized the value of accepting help and support from the organization.

"We have a great program called Widows for Widows. We have about 150 widows who have adopted other widows and it is an amazing program for both the recipients and the mentors."

Other programs include education scholarships for orphans, a special event honouring IDF orphans enlisting in the army, medical assistance and financial aid.

Providing these programs requires funding. While some funds come from the Israeli government, IDFWO mostly relies on donations from outside sources in the Diaspora.

A marriage arranged in heaven?

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

George and Judy Stern share a rare history that includes love at first sight, separation and reunion, and finally a marriage that has endured 60 years and counting.

The Sterns, who celebrated their 60th anniversary on Aug. 16, fondly remember the first time they met – shortly after the most trying time of their lives.

Despite their having grown up within a few miles of each other, it wasn't until after the Holocaust that their decades-long love affair would begin.

George, who was born in 1931 in Ujpest, a small town outside of Budapest, managed to evade the Nazis by leaving home in 1944 to work on a farm owned by his father's friend. Later that year, George took his chances with his fake documents that identified him as a gentile, and lived out the rest of the war in Budapest in a vacant apartment his aunt had access to.

Although George's father survived imprisonment in Bergen-Belsen, his mother was murdered in Auschwitz.

Judy, on the other hand, credits Raoul Wallenberg for her family's survival in Budapest.

In November 1944, the Nazis began to ghettoize the Jews in Budapest. About 70,000 Jews were forced into the ghetto, and about 20,000 more lived in specially marked houses outside the ghetto walls, granted diplomatic protection by politicians including Wallenberg and Carl Ludz, who issued protective passports on behalf of the Swedish and the Swiss.

Judy said her family was one of the families that received the protective papers. "Raoul Wallenberg really saved us," she said.

But the stress and hardship of the war took a toll on Judy's mother, who died suddenly at the age of 47 in 1947.

"At that age, to lose your mother – we were three kids. It was really a disaster," said Judy, who was 15 when her mother died. "She was exhausted. She helped us survive."

After the war, George and Judy, who had not yet met, both looked to the future.

"Right after the war, the Zionist movement became stronger," George said. "There were a lot of young Zionist clubs, like Mizrachi, Hashomer Hatzair, but I belonged to Betar."

Although a Betar member, George said he liked to visit the other club socials as well. He couldn't have known that attending a dance organized by the Mizrachi club, would change the course of his life.

"That was the first time I saw my wife. She was 15 years old. She had black hair. Black. I was with my friends, so we didn't speak to each other. I just noticed her."

To this day, he believes he experienced love at first sight.

At the end of the night, George approached one of Judy's girlfriends to ask about her.

"She told me every Sunday morning, she went to the Saint Gellert Hotel [today known as the Danubius Hotel Gellért]. They had a special pool… so she told me, 'Go there Sunday morning around 9:30 and you'll find her.'"

The following Sunday, George arrived at the pool and

Judy and George Stern

spotted Judy's girlfriend, but not Judy.

"I said, 'Listen, you told me that Judy would be here.' And she said, 'She's here.' She pointed into the pool. There she was, swimming under the water," George said.

"I was a diver in Hungary," Judy said, adding that she was on a competitive diving team there that was destined for the Olympics before the war.

"I jumped in the water and I touched her leg, very delicately," George said. "She came up right away, and she said, 'Who are you?'"

He explained to her how he had first noticed her at the Mizrachi social and she agreed to let George walk her home.

They began to date, but soon after, the two drifted apart when other obligations like school and other activities took precedent.

"We were too young, we weren't too serious," Judy said, adding that they didn't stay in touch – those were the days before cellphones and computers.

A year later, in May 1948, news that Israel had declared its independence reached Hungary.

The Hungarian government granted 500 passports to young Jews who wanted to make aliyah. Before that, they would have had to transfer to a British displaced persons camp until they were cleared by the British to enter.

George, who wanted desperately to immigrate to Israel to join the army, was one of the 500 chosen.

Prior to their departure for Israel, there was a three-day preparation session at a campsite in Yugoslavia.

"I was walking around in the evening and who did I meet? Judy," George said.

"I wanted to make aliyah, too," Judy said. "I wanted to get out of Hungary. I was a Zionist and I wanted to go to Israel."

Although they were happy to see each other when they boarded the cargo ship for the 10-day voyage to Israel, beyond checking in with each other occasionally, they spent their time on opposite sides of the ship.

As soon as the ship docked in Haifa, George enlisted in the Israeli army. Judy, 16, decided to finish her high school studies and enrol in teachers college in Jerusalem.

"We separated again, and I didn't know where she went," George said.

The following Pesach, Judy visited her uncle who lived in Tel Aviv. As she stood outside the Great Synagogue on Allenby Street, she noticed a young soldier with a familiar face.

"Then I heard my name. I said, 'What's going on here?' I turned around and saw the soldier holding a prayer book. It was him… When we saw each other on Allenby, that was really a miracle," she said.

"We connected and we never separated," George said.

By the following Pesach, they were engaged, and on Aug. 16, 1951, they wed.

Sixty years later, the Sterns will be honoured with a special ceremony on Aug. 20 at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, where they are longtime members.

George said Rabbi Wayne Allen will say a few words about their milestone and a luncheon will follow the Shabbat service.

What worked for George and his wife, he said is his philosophy is to "forgive and forget. If you love somebody, you love somebody."

"And we didn't have such an easy time, but we loved each other," Judy added. "We never took something too seriously because he knew I never wanted to hurt him and I knew he never wanted to hurt me."

It also helps to have both their mothers looking down on them, George said.

"I believe my mother and her mother arranged this wedding, this marriage, because twice we accidently met."

Non-Jewish business students tour Israel

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

There is no shortage of student trips to Israel, but there aren't many that attract non-Jewish students who are likely future business leaders.

Since 2007, students from the University of Western Ontario's Ivey School of Business have been participating in 10-day tours that offer economic, historical, political and cultural perspectives on the country.

"By dealing with future business leaders, and going with the best of the best from your school, you're making a difference and instilling a positive view of Israel into people who are going to change the world and are going to emerge as top business leaders in the next 20 years," said Sam Strasser a 21-year-old recent Ivey graduate who helped organize the tour this past February.

Hayley Rovet, 21, who is entering her fourth year at Ivey in September, said the students arrive in Israel "with very limited knowledge and extremely skewed perceptions" of the country.

"We strive to educate them in two ways: about the business side of things, by meeting with business leaders to show them how prosperous and innovative Israel is, and we also take them to see a number of political leaders who discuss both sides of the conflict to inform them and give them a more informed understanding on what's going on," Rovet said.

Twenty-nine students – 22 of whom were not Jewish and had never before been to Israel – took part in the trip that included a tour of Jerusalem's Old City, the Weizmann Institute of Science, the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, as well as meetings with Jerusalem Post Palestinian affairs correspondent Khaled Abu Toameh and Ha'aretz diplomatic editor Aluf Benn.

Strasser, who now works as an analyst for Bond Street Mercantile, a company that invests in Israeli businesses, said the goal of the trip is to frame Israel as an amazing economic success story, "how a county with no natural resources at the time, how only human capital growing in a war-torn area can use its innovation and knowledge to become a world power economically."

The trip, which is a fully accredited course at Ivey that requires students to write a 2,000-word reflection paper, included visits to places of business that embody the concept of the "triple bottom line.

"The big thing they teach you in business school these days is the triple bottom line, which is people, planet, profit. Everyone asks, 'How are you going to be a business person that changes the world… that makes the world a better place, while still meeting your economic accomplishments and goals?" Strasser said.

He said this concept in action was evident during their visit to Iscar, one of the world's largest manufacturers of carbide industrial-cutting tools, which are used by car manufacturers such as General Motors and Ford.

Iscar was billionaire investor Warren Buffett's first investment in a non-American company.

Another highlight of this year's trip was the visit to Better Place Center, home of the company that makes electric cars.

"We actually got to test-drive the cars this year. Right now, if you follow the news on Better Place, they are slowly emerging and setting up the infrastructure around the world. Even in Ontario," Strasser said.

The trip participants, who Strasser calls "the smartest people he's ever been around," now have a new appreciation for Israel.

Rovet, who will be organizing next year's trip with Ivey student Jared Goldberg, said the cultural and historical aspect of the trip was just as important as the business side.

She said that when they toured Yad Vashem, the Holocaust martyrs and heroes' remembrance authority, many were deeply moved by what they learned.

"Many of these students have no personal connection [to the Holocaust], so I was very interested to see what would happen when we brought them there," Rovet said.

"Some of the students were very emotional. They were crying and I was not expecting that." In fact, weeks later, when the annual Israeli Apartheid Week events were taking place on campus, Rovet said many of the trip's non-Jewish participants chose to attend the anti-Israel events to speak in defence of Israel and challenge the claims made.

Strasser said the trips have been such a success that they're hoping to expand this concept to other business schools in the country.

The only obstacle, he said, is funding.

Strasser, who worked with Tamar Zagdanski to gather funding from private donors, said it costs about $100,000 to subsidize the tour and cover about 80 per cent of the cost.

"We hope that universities across Canada will start doing it autonomously, and we'd love to help them with the foundation, setting up the itinerary," he said.

For more information about the trip or to apply, contact Rovet at HRovet.HBA2012@ivey.ca.

Are you getting enough water?

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

Your body is estimated to be about 70 per cent water. Your blood is mostly water, and your muscles, lungs and brain all contain loads of water. So why is it so hard to drink it?

Water has many functions in our body. It regulates body temperature, transports waste, helps maintain a healthy metabolic rate, supports tissue and cell structure, and controls heart rate as well as blood pressure. Water is a very important nutrient and an essential component in maintaining health.

Most people aren't aware that their bodies are only one or two percentage points away from dehydration. Dehydration occurs when you lose more fluid than you take in, and thirst isn't always a reliable gauge of the body's need for water, especially in children and older adults. The body hides mild dehydration well, and it can take hours before you realize that you're dehydrated. Symptoms of mild dehydration include thirst, reduced sweating, decreased urine, dry mouth, headache, muscle cramps and reduced skin elasticity.

If dehydration continues, the cells in the body begin to shrivel and malfunction, causing tissues to begin to dry out. The body's electrolytes may become deficient, and the amount of water in the bloodstream will decrease, which can cause blood pressure to drop, resulting in light-headedness or fainting.

We need fluids to survive. Common causes of dehydration include medications, not drinking water, exercise, excess sweating, diarrhea, vomiting and fever. Healthy adults should aim to drink six to eight glasses of water a day, which means drink enough fluids so you go to the bathroom every two to four hours. Try drinking frequently throughout the day, rather than drinking large amounts at mealtime.

Water isn't the only way to stay hydrated. Fruit and vegetables contain lots of water. An orange is 90 per cent water, which can help you re-hydrate. Eating foods such as soup, yogurt, watermelon or salad can also help you stay hydrated on a super hot day.

Chassidim must pay for fire-dousing water

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The municipality of Boisbriand has decided to charge a chassidic community for the water used to fight a recent fire that left more than a dozen families homeless.

Marlene Cordato, mayor of the town of 26,000 north of Laval, said the reason is that the water main system within the community's enclave is private.

The price tag could be about $5,000.

However, the council also cited its exasperation with a long-running dispute with the Tasher institutions over non-payment of water taxes.

The community is appealing a Quebec Court order in April to pay more than $1.35 million owing since 2005. Two previous court decisions also favoured the municipality.

In July, the municipality launched a legal proceeding opposing the community's appeal.

The fire occurred the night of July 31-Aug. 1 in an 18-unit apartment building that was heavily damaged despite the efforts of several local fire departments to put it out.

Cordato said the water came from hydrants supplied directly by the town's aqueduct.

The community's water consumption is monitored by a single meter at the entrance of its enclave, unlike other buildings in the town, which have individual meters. It's not the general practice, however, to charge for water used to extinguish a residential fire.

Tosh spokesperson Max Liberman called Boisbriand's decision unjust. He said the community won't pay the water taxes until there are meters on each building.

The town said water supply arrangement with the community is spelled out in a 1990 agreement.

Nazi-looted art to be resold

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL—A Nazi-looted Gustav Klimt painting restituted to a Montreal man by an Austrian museum this past spring is to be sold at auction in the fall.

Georges Jorisch, 83, grandson of the masterpiece's prewar Viennese Jewish owner, has agreed to split the proceeds from the sale of the 1915 landscape Litzlberg on the Attersee with the Museum of Modern Art in Salzburg, which returned it. The oil painting has been valued at between $29 and $44 million.

The auction is scheduled for Nov. 2 at Sotheby's in New York.

The state-owned museum announced in April that the work would be restored to claimant Jorisch, who has lived modestly and obscurely in Montreal since immigrating here from Belgium in 1956.

The painting was returned to Jorisch in July, following final approval by the Salzburg provincial assembly.

Metropolitan kosher ice cream makes summer cool

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

What would we do all summer without a steady supply of kosher ice cream? If you've ever made it at home, you probably used milk or cream, sugar, and maybe eggs, and vanilla, mint or nuts.

But modern industrial kosher production isn't so simple. Additives such as flavourings, colourings and stabilizers can all conspire to ruin a Jewish kid's summer day.

With the help of the Kashruth Council of Canada, Metropolitan Ice Cream has been churning out gourmet kosher frozen desserts since the early 1980s. At peak production, Metropolitan can produce 400 litres of ice cream per hour. That's a lot of sweetness, as a peek into their giant freezer room attests. Don't stay in there too long, though: temperatures hover around -25 Celsius all year round.

Even in a factory, making ice cream is basically the same as at home, but you'll need large metal tanks that hold hundreds of litres. For dairy ice cream, base ingredients are mixed, then they're pasteurized to kill any harmful organisms and improve texture. This is the only stage in which heat is used, which makes kosher supervision much simpler. If heat were involved, the process would be more elaborate, with rabbinical required supervision throughout the manufacturing process.

When Tony Zuccaro's family first took over the business in 1995, he ate ice cream every day. It's still tough to resist: he prides himself on taking no shortcuts, using local fruit in season, and real milk, not powdered, despite growing industry pressure.

"If you use powdered milk, you add... other ingredients that are not from a cow – you're saving 30 per cent on your milk cost."

Not all of Metropolitan's frozen treats are kosher, but the emphasis on pure ingredients gives Metropolitan an advantage in complying with Kashruth Council guidelines, which haven't changed much over the years: every ingredient but milk must bear a symbol from a recognized kashrut organization such as the OU or MK, or the council's own COR.

Fresh fruit is an exception. All fruit is kosher, so large fruits such as bananas, orange and lemons are easy. But insects can sometimes be found in small fruits, such as raspberries and strawberries, which Metropolitan buys locally.

"There's no way they could use whole raspberries," said the Kashruth Council's Rabbi Sholom Adler. Instead, berries are individually quick frozen, then puréed in large batches, which halachically nullifies any insects that may have been present.

But with other ingredients, even if they're all natural, there are pitfalls, such as flavourings. Rabbi Adler notes that "every flavour has 80 to 100 components," some of which could come from non-kosher sources, such as civet, derived from glands of male and female civet cats.

Metropolitan uses food colouring in certain flavours, mainly because people expect it. Zuccaro says "some customers insist that banana flavour should be yellow," or that pistachio be green. Colourings can be water- or oil-based, lending another dimension to the detective work of keeping it all kosher.

Some colourings, such as a red dye used in candy or maraschino cherries, are derived from insects – making them natural, but completely non-kosher. Then there are emulsifiers, which include the eggs you might add to homemade ice cream to improve its texture, but can also include fats and oils from non-kosher animals.

And if you've ever seen mono- or diglycerides on a product's ingredients, these are just part of a large category of additives that keep ice cream smoothly mixed and palatable. They, too, can come from animal sources if there's no kosher symbol. Similarly, gelatin, seen frequently in low- or no-fat yogurt products, replaces some of the smoothness and lost "mouth-feel" of the fat. It also keeps ice cream stable longer at room temperature.

Ultimately, consumers can't tell anymore what's kosher just by reading a label. "Rabbis go through formulas, and formulas of sub-ingredients, to make sure it's kosher," Rabbi Adler says. The Kashruth Council maintains a database of thousands of ingredients and suppliers just to keep up with the complex world of food additives.

Flavourings and fruit are added right at the end, while the mix is pumped into a continuous freezer, which is powerful enough to start pumping out frozen ice cream within 30 seconds. For gelato and pareve desserts, there are smaller batch freezers that take about 10-15 minutes.

Adler says that because the process at Metropolitan is all cold – non-kosher ingredients such as gelatin or wine are only added at the freezing stage – cleaning the equipment well between non-kosher and kosher flavours is sufficient. "The wash is a standard procedure for Metropolitan," he says. "This is an inherent reassurance that they will wash the machine properly for their own purposes."

Because heat isn't involved, supervision is less complicated. Mashgichim (supervisors) have access to the factory at any time, but generally only need to come through about eight times a year.

Dairy and non-dairy desserts are produced in entirely separate rooms, ensuring that the word "pareve" on the label means exactly what it says.

Zuccaro says kosher is on its way to being seen as yet another layer of quality and supervision, similar to food-safety and quality programs such as HACCP and ISO. The Kashrut Council's marketing director Richard Rabkin notes that "only 15 per cent of kosher consumers are Jewish – others are vegetarian, vegan, Muslim."

Zuccaro's committment to kosher goes beyond ice cream to his longstanding friendship with the Jewish community through donations and sponsorships, for which thank-you letters line the walls of Metropolitan's boardroom, as well as ongoing relationships with major caterers, providing specific custom products or flavours, such as Chocolate Chipotle or Honey Pumpkin, on request.

He admits he can't undercut some competitors on price. "If cream costs $6 a litre, how can you sell two litres of ice cream for $6? Obviously, it's not cream." Instead, he says, "we make ice cream the way a chef would make it in the kitchen."

Making the Grade after High School: College, University and Beyond

Nine years ago, after a long career as a university teacher and advisor, Judy Libman was convinced that high school and post-secondary students needed more individualized assistance. Soon after winning York University's highest teaching award, she founded Ambitions Educational Consulting, a unique counselling service for students and parents. Since then, she has worked with over 500 students on their way to academic success.

Judy Libman advises each student as a unique individual: no "one-size-fits-all" answers here. For high school students, Libman identifies university or college programs that will provide the best match for a student's interests, goals and learning style. Her familiarity with programs in Ontario and across Canada gives students a wide range of choices.

Libman is also well-known for her expert counseling in US college admissions. She serves as a consultant for US college admissions at several top Toronto private schools.

For students already in university, Libman provides advising on career options, graduate programs, and professional school admissions. Her longtime specialty is the medical school admissions process, with an admirable track record of success.

Judy Libman also counsels students who have had learning difficulties or an unexpected academic setback and need help finding their way back to success. As a former university administrator, she knows how to work with both students and institutions to overcome barriers.

For more information on Ambitions Educational Consulting, visit www.ambitions.ca or phone 416-780-0288 for an appointment.

The hardest questions aren't on the exam!

How do I choose a university or college – in Canada or the US? • What does it take to get in? • What programs and career options should I consider? • How do I get back on track if I have had academic difficulties? • How can I improve my chances for admission to a professional school? • Should I consider graduate school? • What if I have no focus yet? • Everyone always told me to keep my options open – so, now what?

Expert individual educational counselling for high school and post-secondary students.

"A HUGE amount of my success is due to you and all your input. You set me on the right track, put things into perspective, provided me with excellent direct feedback and you made me laugh. THANK YOU."

Oraynu – A Secular Jewish School Families Love!

"My son really looks forward to Sunday mornings."

This comment is typical of the parents whose children attend Oraynu. We teach Jewish history and culture from a secular humanistic perspective, focusing on values. Children are truly engaged at Oraynu and learn through a variety of meaningful experiential approaches.

The children "do" and "act" through lively, rich participatory discussions. Family Education events, tzedakah projects, music, Hebrew, crafts and community performances at festivals. Our family holiday celebrations are warm and full of fun.

"My daughter feels good about being Jewish."

Building a Jewish identity at Oraynu is enjoyable as the children experience positive affirmations of their Jewishness in every class.

"The Bnai Mitzvah blew me away. I was so moved by the ceremony."

Imagine a Bnai Mitzvah program where students choose their own projects, based on modern Jewish heroes, ancient sages, humour, authors, anti-semitism, etc. Individual ceremonies are offered: Torah reading is optional.

If you identify as a cultural or secular Jew, humanist, agnostic or are intermarried, we welcome your family to join us.

Our school is funded with support from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Iran to build base in Syria: report

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Western intelligence agencies believe that Iran will provide funding for "a multi-million-dollar military base" in Syria, according to a report published Saturday in a British newspaper.

According to the Daily Telegraph, the deal would assist with the development of an Iranian military compound at Syria's Latakia airport to be completed by the end of next year. The agreement will open a supply route that will allow Iran to transfer military hardware to Syria.

Furthermore, the report says, teams of Iranian Revolutionary Guard officers are to be stationed at Latakia on a permanent basis, where they will co-ordinate arms shipments with Syria's secret intelligence service.

According to the report, western security officials say the deal was agreed upon following Syria's Deputy Vice-President of Security Affairs Muhammad Nasif Kheirbek visit to Tehran in June. Kheirbek is known to be one of the most powerful figures within Syria's security establishment.

Iran and Syria have enjoyed a close alliance based on mutual disdain for the West over the past several decades. In return for Iran's military support, Syria has bolstered Tehran's attempts to develop the Islamic Hezbollah militia into a major political player in Lebanon.

Recent months have seen Iran deeply alarmed by the ongoing rebellion against President Bashar Assad's regime. According to western diplomats, Iran has been sending riot control equipment, intelligence monitoring techniques, and oil to Damascus to help Assad quash the uprising.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

In related news, in an interview with Russia Today news network on Saturday, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad warned that he would respond harshly to any attempts by Israel or the United States to launch a war against the Islamic republic, saying Iran would give a "decisive response" to any strike.

"We have a saying in our language: If someone throws a smaller stone [at you], you should respond with a bigger stone," Ahmadinejad said, adding, "we will defend ourselves within our capabilities."

He told the Russian news network that the United States and Israel "wish to do it [launch an attack against Iran], they want to do it, but they know about our power. They know that we are going to give them a decisive response."

Despite this warning, Ahmadinejad expressed hope in the interview that such a reality would never materialize, claiming there is no reason to launch a strike against Iran. He then went on to accuse Israel of being a regime that depends on terror, occupation and aggression.

The international community has called on Iran to halt its nuclear program, leveling sanctions against it, but Iran claims the program is for peaceful purposes and continues to enrich uranium.

Earlier this year, former Mossad head Meir Dagan said that an air force strike against Iran's nuclear installations would be "a stupid thing."

Dagan claimed that Iran has a secret infrastructure for its nuclear program that is working in parallel with the legitimate, civilian program, but only the latter is under international inspection.

"Any strike against that [the civilian program] is an illegal act according to international law," Dagan said.

He said that contrary to the situation in Iraq, where the nuclear plant of then-president Saddam Hussein was bombed in 1981, Iran has dispersed its nuclear sites across the country, making an effective attack difficult. He added that Iran has a proven ability to move its nuclear infrastructures from place to place, in order to hide them from international inspectors and intelligence services.

"If someone in Iran decides to build a laboratory for centrifuges [for uranium enrichment] in the basement of some school, he has no problem doing this," Dagan said.

He warned that an air strike against Iran has "potential for significant complications and it is best to avoid war with non-beneficial results and also those with no lasting effect. It is important to remember that war is only one option among many alternatives."

Chinese military chief visits Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — China's chief of staff, Gen. Chen Bingde, was in Israel this week on the first visit to the country by a senior Chinese army commander.

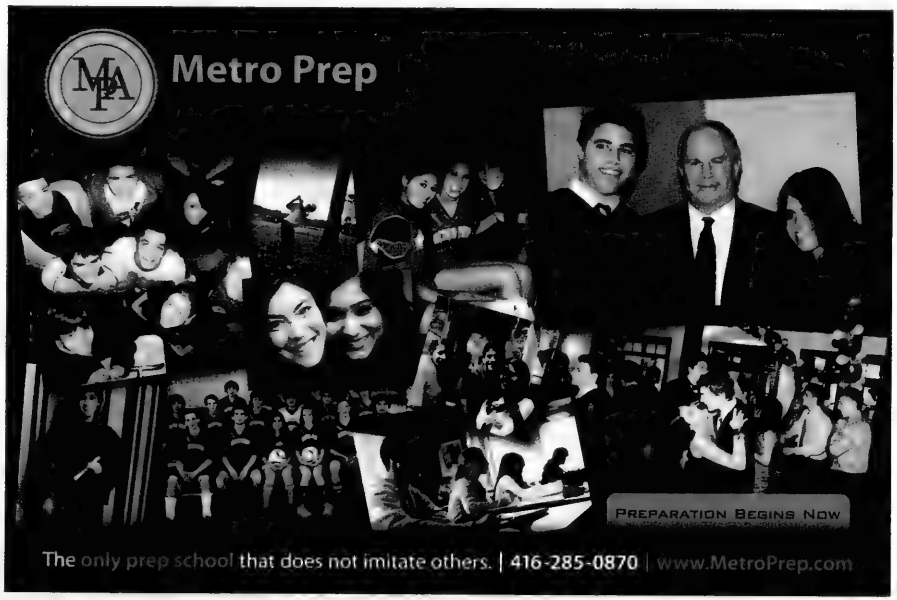
Bingde was to spend four days visiting Israel Defence Forces units and meeting senior members of the defence establishment. He was also scheduled to visit the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial museum in Jerusalem. Bingde was also guest of honour at a meal hosted by IDF Chief of Staff Benny Gantz.

Diplomatic and military ties between Israel and China had been strained over the past decade after the cancellation, due to heavy U.S. pressure, of a deal in which China was to buy Israel's early-warning Falcon aircraft.

Within the past year, relations between Israeli military and intelligence agencies and their Chinese counterparts have improved. Two months ago, Israel Defence Minister Ehud Barak visited China in what was termed a highly successful trip.

Israeli defence official have said that despite the fact that Israeli military sales to China had not resumed due to American objections, the two countries had been exchanging intelligence information and know-how on combating Islamic terrorism, which China, too, has experienced in the northwest of the country. The Chinese army has also shown great interest in Israeli military doctrine.

For its part, Israel has shown an interest in maintaining good relations with China in light of its diplomatic and military influence and the wide-ranging ties the Chinese military has in the Arab world and with North Korea, which has supplied missiles to Iran.



Mubarak charged with corruption

— Selling natural gas to 'the Israeli enemy' —

Anti-Mubarak protesters shout their hatred of him outside the hospital where he was treated. [Flash90 photo]

JERUSALEM — Ousted Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak returned to court Monday to face charges of complicity in the killing of protesters and corruption in selling natural gas to "the Israeli enemy," the first Arab leader to stand trial in person since popular uprisings began sweeping the Middle East.

A helicopter landed near the court, and shortly afterward, the ailing Mubarak, 83, wearing a navy blue sports sweater, was wheeled on a gurney into the courtroom's steel cage for the second session of his trial.

Hundreds of riot police stood guard, but clashes erupted between a crowd of Mubarak supporters outside the building and a group demanding justice for those killed in the uprising that toppled him six months ago.

"The thief has arrived!" the anti-Mubarak protesters shouted, drawing whistles from his supporters.

"Judge wake up! Mubarak killed my brothers! Execute the killer!" others shouted. The pro-Mubarak crowd threw stones, the police cordon dividing the two groups broke and the Mubarak supporters chased their opponents away from the court building. Al Jazeera reported that some of the former president's supporters attacked its correspondents.

In a courtroom packed with lawyers, Mubarak looked composed and stern, hands clasped over his chest. An intravenous needle had been inserted into his left hand. He was not wearing the regulation white clothing of prisoners.

Mubarak exchanged a few words with his sons, Alaa and Gamal, also on trial, and in the same cage with their father. They sought to shield him from cameras and one of them kissed Mubarak on the forehead to comfort him.

Mubarak and his sons are accused of conspiring to sell gas to Israel at far lower prices than those of the international market. All three deny these charges.

Judge Ahmed Refaat called Mubarak's name, and he answered, "Present." Refaat appealed for calm, ordering everyone to sit down to allow proceedings to begin. The judge demanded quiet more than once. "No one can hear 100 people all talking simultaneously," he said.

After the charges were read out, Mubarak declared: "I do not admit and I deny [the charges] attributed to me."

The hearing could decide if the head of the ruling military council, Field Marshal Mohamed Hussein Tantawi, will take the stand as a witness.

Lawyers on both sides asked for Tantawi, former intelligence chief Omar Suleiman and about 1,600 others to testify as witnesses.

"Tantawi's testimony would help the court determine whether Mubarak gave orders to the interior minister, Habib al-Adli, to fire at protesters or whether Adli was acting independently," said a member of the defence team, who asked not to be named.

Defence lawyers say that any testimony by Tantawi on Mubarak's role in trying to suppress the 18-day uprising could decide the ex-president's fate.

Tantawi's military council has promised a transition to democracy in the Arab world's most populous country - a process far from complete and, the pro-reform camp says, vulnerable to high-level obstruction.

A Reuters reporter saw the crowds outside the court building piles of stones to throw at each other. One protester attacked a policeman. Then police jumped on him and beat him.

"All this hatred is because we let an evil man rule us for 30 years," a senior police officer told Reuters without giving his name.

Refaat ordered that the trial be merged with Adli's and said TV coverage of the trial would end until sentencing takes place.

The charges against the former air force commander could carry the death penalty. The opening session was aired live and counted as his first public appearance since Feb. 11.

For generations, Arab world leaders ruled for life and were seldom held to account. But Mubarak now stands accused of authorizing the use of live ammunition to quell protests, as well as of corruption and abuse of power.

Medical reports issued after Mubarak was taken to a hospital following initial questioning in April said he was suffering from heart problems, depression and fainting fits.

"I want people to read their history and know what this great man has done for us. He kept Egypt stable. He has been humiliated but he is weathering the storm with pride," Ehab Sameh, 30, said outside the court.

Mubarak's lawyer, Farid al-Deeb, demanded that the case be postponed to give him time to view all the documents submitted to court. Lawyers for the plaintiffs asked the judge to split the trial to consider separately the charges over the killings and those involving graft in gas exports to Israel.

The judge ordered a recess to consider the requests. He said the court would reconvene on Sept. 5 to begin hearing evidence in the case.

Around 850 people were killed during the uprising and more than 6,000 wounded when security forces fired live rounds and rubber bullets and used water cannons and batons against the protesters.

More affordable housing?

The Israel Lands Administration Council has approved a plan to offer more affordable housing to some Israelis. The plan, which comes after four weeks of protests throughout Israel calling for affordable housing, would provide discounts to developers building more affordable housing units. It would also give preference to those who served in the army or national service, which would negatively affect the haredi and Arab sectors. In the past, preference for cheaper housing was given to families with more than three children, which disproportionately favoured haredim and Arab families.

New units for east Jerusalem

Israel's interior minister, Eli Yishai, gave final approval to a project to build 1,600 housing units in Ramat Shlomo, a Jewish area of east Jerusalem. In March 2010, the Jerusalem municipality's approval of the project came during a visit by U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden, causing a diplomatic uproar. The Ramat Shlomo announcement came a week after the Interior Ministry's Jerusalem district planning and building committee approved plans for 930 housing units in the east Jerusalem neighbourhood of Har Homa. U.S. President Barack Obama is among world leaders who have criticized the approval of the Ramat Shlomo project and new Jewish housing in eastern Jerusalem in general.

Barak approves 277 Ariel apartments

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak approved a plan to build 277 apartments in the West Bank settlement of Ariel, 100 of them for families evacuated from Gaza six years ago.

Barak approved the marketing of the apartments last week, the Defence Ministry announced Monday. Building permits for the units had been awarded previously, but marketing them was delayed due to diplomatic concerns, Ha'aretz reported.

Construction is expected to take three years.

More than one-third of the apartments will go to Jewish families removed from their homes in the Netzarim settlement in Gush Katif in the Gaza in 2005.

Ehud Barak

Ariel is home to about 20,000 Jewish settlers. It's located some 11 miles east of the Green Line.

The announcement came a week after Israel's interior minister gave final approval to a project to build 1,600 housing units in Ramat Shlomo, a Jewish neighbourhood of eastern Jerusalem, and two weeks after 930 housing units in the eastern Jerusalem neighbourhood of Har Homa were given final approval by the Interior Ministry's Jerusalem district planning and building committee.

The announcement also came after four weeks of protests in Israel calling for more available and affordable housing.

London riots affect Jewish communities

JTA

LONDON — Rioting in London spread to heavily Jewish neighbourhoods this week.

Stores in the Jewish communities of Stamford Hill and Golders Green were urged to close and to secure merchandise Monday night, as unrest that began Saturday night in the north London suburb of Tottenham spread throughout the city.

Residents of Tottenham's chassidic community reportedly gathered on the street to heckle police on Shabbat, the Guardian reported.

But following warnings from local rabbis and the Shomrim Orthodox security service, most members of the Jewish community stayed away from the riots, according to the London Jewish Chronicle. They were advised that they could go to synagogue, however.

No synagogues have been reported damaged in the riots, though some Jewish-owned stores have been ransacked, the Chronicle reported.

A YouTube video showed some young Orthodox men handing out challah to passing residents from a cardboard box.

At least two stabbings were reported Monday night in Stamford Hill.

The rioting began Aug. 6 following the shooting of an alleged drug dealer, Mark Duggan. The violence spread first to youth in poorer neighborhoods.

IDF mining Syrian border

In anticipation of expected demonstrations and attempted infiltrations following the Palestinians' attempt to achieve statehood at the UN, the Israeli army is planting anti-personnel mines at the Syrian border between Syria and the Golan Heights.

On May 15, protesters from Syria, Lebanon and Gaza marking Nakba Day, or Catastrophe Day – the day Israel achieved statehood in 1948 – tried to breach Israel's border, and some succeeded. As many as four Syrian protesters and up to 10 Lebanese protesters were killed during the infiltration attempts.

Protesters in Syria again attempted to cross the border into Israel on June 5. Syria claims that 24 people were killed during the frenzy.

Mines planted by the Israeli military in the 1970s failed to detonate during the recent infiltration attempts.

The operation will continue for several weeks, the IDF's weekly magazine, Bamahane, reported.

Sarah's Key, a moving tale about the Holocaust in France

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

"These black hours will stain our history forever and are an injury to our past and our traditions."

So solemnly declared Jacques Chirac, the president of France, on July 16, 1995 in atonement for France's complicit role in the Holocaust.

He was referring to a roundup by French police of 13,152 Jews in Paris that unfolded over two days in mid-July 1942. Eight thousand of the detainees, men, women and children were taken to the Velodrome, an outdoor bicycling stadium, near the iconic Eiffel Tower, where conditions were appalling.

After five days, they were transported to transit camps, and then shipped to Auschwitz, becoming among the 76,000 Jews in France who were murdered during the 1940-1944 Nazi occupation.

The Velodrome incident is at the centre of Gilles Paquet-Brenner's poignant and moving feature film, Sarah's Key, which opens in Toronto at the Varsity and the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard on Aug. 19.

Starring the incandescent Kristin Scott-Thomas as a Paris-based American journalist caught up in a historical drama that fuses the past with the present, the movie is based on a bestselling novel by Tatiana de Rosnay.

As the screen flickers to life, French policemen go door to door arresting Jewish families in their homes. Sarah Starzynski (Melusine Mayance), the 10-year-old daughter of one of the families whose lives are to be torn asunder, protectively locks her younger brother in a closet, promising to fetch him soon.

But as fate would have it, she cannot keep her promise. She and her parents, having been thrown into the cramped and filthy confines of the Velodrome are sent to a transit camp where families are cruelly separated.

Fast-forwarding to contemporary Paris, Sarah's Key segues to the editorial office of a newsmagazine where four journalists vigorously discuss topics worthy of coverage. Julia Jarmond (Scott-Thomas), a seasoned reporter who has lived in Paris for 25 years and whose husband is French, suggests a piece on the Velodrome.

With the Velodrome anniversary approaching, the editor agrees. Since Jarmond's younger colleagues are historically ignorant and know nothing about this telling incident, she gives them a capsule account of it. "This was not the Nazis," she says of the infamous roundup. "This was the French."

Kristin Scott-Thomas is incandescent as a journalist seeking the truth in Sarah's Key.

Although much of France was occupied by Germany, Vichy France, led by Henri Philippe Petain, was a willing collaborator in the persecution and deportation of Jews. France, home to the Enlightenment and the Declaration of the Rights of Man, committed terrible crimes in the name of national solidarity and sovereignty.

As Jarmond researches the story, talking to survivors and bystanders, she discovers an unpleasant fact. The apartment in the once highly Jewish but now trendy Marais district she and her husband are renovating is stained by the history of that ugly event. After the Starzynskis were deported, her husband's mother, now in frail health, took over their "vacant" flat. Jarmond's spouse has no clue it once belonged to a Jewish family. The revelation opens a Pandora's box of heretofore concealed secrets, which threaten to unravel their marriage.

With the Starzynskis having been deposited in the Beaune-la-Rolande transit camp, a way station to Auschwitz, they soon learn they are doomed. Strong and resilient, Sarah manages to persuade a French guard to let her and a friend escape. In an esthetically magical moment, they cross a late-autumn golden wheat field.

As they seek help and sustenance, they are shooed away by an unfeeling farmer, a symbol of French callousness and indifference. Fortunately, a compassionate elderly couple take pity on the girls and shelter them when they most require assistance and empathy.

With the film having moved back to the present day, Jarmond expands her dogged investigation of what happened to Sarah. Did she survive the war, and if so, what became of her and her brother?

Digging deeper, she discovers that the truth – the holy grail of all good journalists – has a price tag, and that everyone is ultimately shaped by the forces of the past.

Above all, Sarah's Key, an emotionally visceral plunge into the abyss of the Holocaust, is about the enduring importance of memory.

A tender film about friendship and patriotism

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff reporter

The unlikely friendship between a Jewish boy and a British soldier in the waning years of Britain's mandate in Palestine underpins the plot of Lynn Roth's tender and nostalgic feature film, The Little Traitor, which is scheduled to open at the Cumberland and the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard on Aug. 19.

The 89-minute movie is mostly set in Jerusalem on the eve of the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan and is based on the Amos Oz novel Panther in the Basement.

Exploring universal themes such as patriotism and friendship, and expertly directed, it unfolds in English and Hebrew.

The central character, Avi (Proffy) Liebowitz (Ido Port), is an exceptionally intelligent boy wise beyond his years. The son of Holocaust survivors from Poland, he is an ardent Zionist who yearns to join the anti-British Irgun militia.

In the meantime, he plays war games with his toy soldiers and friends, regularly shouts the nationalist slogan "freedom or death" and daubs the inflammatory words "British Go Home" on a stone wall.

One day, after violating the British curfew, Avi is detained by a portly British sergeant, Steven Dunlap (Alfred Molina), the son of a lay minister. As they talk, they strike up a budding friendship, and Dunlap invites Avi to meet him at a British club for more chats.

A boy who lives in his fervent imagination, Avi is drawn to Dunlap because his father (Rami Heuberger) is so emotionally remote.

Taking up Dunlap's invitation, Avi discovers that his new-found friend is reading the biblical Book of Samuel and trying to learn the rudiments of Hebrew. Given his interests, Dunlap is certainly different than most British soldiers serving in Palestine. But Avi appears to disappoint Dunlap, preferring comic books to biblical tales and considering the Book of Samuel boring.

Alfred Molina and Ido Port in The Little Traitor.

Their friendship is strained by a British crackdown on the Yishuv, the Jewish community of Palestine, but their bonds remain intact and their conversations continue. Dunlap, in an unguarded moment, predicts that Britain's withdrawal from Palestine will result in the emergence of a Hebrew state and stoke further tension between Jews and Palestinian Arabs.

Not surprisingly, Avi's ties with the Briton arouse suspicions among some Jews, prompting Avi to wonder whether his supposed British enemy, Dunlap, is more of a friend than his Jewish friends and whether he and his parents should leave Palestine.

Port delivers an amazing performance as a 12-year-old boy who navigates the shoals of friendship, patriotism and romance. is just right as a sensitive and avuncular man who has a knack for making personal connections. Heuberger acquits himself well as Avi's severe father, while Gilya Stern glints with compassion as his protective mother.

The Little Traitor is family fare at its best, a film that cares about story line, historical accuracy and character development. And the elegiac musical score is terrific.

Torontonian to make a Yiddish feature film

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Toronto filmmaker Naomi Jaye is set to produce Canada's, and possibly North America's, first Yiddish feature film in more than 70 years.

Jaye, 38, has spent the past four years scripting and developing her film The Pin.

It's the story of an elderly, isolated shomer who comes face-to-face with his first love, Leah, when her body is brought to him in the morgue.

The event triggers a series of flashbacks to Lithuania during the World War II, when the young couple spent their courtship on the run and hiding from the Einsatzgruppen, the paramilitary death squads that killed thousands of Jews and others throughout German-occupied Europe.

Without giving too much of the story away – the film has not even been entirely cast yet – Leah's re-entry into the shomer's life all these years later allows him to fulfil a promise she made him swear to keep: to prick her hand with a pin to ensure she is truly dead before burial.

Jaye said the film, which is still in development, was inspired by her grandmother, who had an intense fear of being buried alive and made Jaye's father promise to stick a pin in her hand after she died to ensure she was dead before being placed in a coffin.

"This story always fascinated me, because it required an act of true love that was also an act of violence," Jaye wrote in the press kit for the film.

Jaye said the film would be a very "quiet" one, with minimal dialogue. But what dialogue there is will be mostly in Yiddish, the language the shomer and Leah would have spoken as young Jews in Lithuania.

There will be English subtitles.

"It wasn't my intention to make a Yiddish film," she said. "It was my intention to make a beautiful, poetic film. It's a film that speaks to the larger issues of hatred and intolerance, about coming to terms with the past and making peace with it."

The theme is a familiar one to Jaye, who said she's always been drawn to stories about men who "have isolated themselves and are then forced to connect again."

Asked why this is, Jaye laughed and responded she didn't know. "It must say something about me, but I have no idea what."

She said she's always been a huge fan of intimate movies that depict "something of humanity" and wants to emulate that in her own filmmaking.

Jaye said she grew up in a traditional Jewish home, but decided that organized religion wasn't for her. She said when she turned 18 she rejected her Judaism, but that when she started making films in 1999, she discovered that all her projects were linked by a common thread: Jewish content.

"I have come to realize that my Jewishness is innate to who I am It is a part of my genetic code, my emotional history, and as such, it forms a huge part of the images that swirl around my imagination and eventually become my films," she wrote in the literature promoting The Pin.

Jaye won the Women in Film and Television Toronto's 2009 Kodak New Vision Mentorship award.

That award – which provides the recipient with a $5,000 donation of film stock – and subsequent grants of $20,000 from the Canada Council for the Arts and an Ontario Arts Council production grant for $39,000 have helped move production along.

Ten-year-old a finalist in TV singing competition

Laura Fixman
Intern

Aiden Shufman, 10, said she loved being one of the 16 finalists on the YTV show The Next Star because she had the chance to sing with other talented kids.

Aiden, who is from Thornhill, Ont., will be entering Grade 5 at Baythorn Public School next month. She enjoyed watching the show and said that's what encouraged her to audition.

"When I auditioned, at first I was kind of nervous," Aiden said. "But it was really fun to audition and meet the judges."

The Next Star is a singing competition for kids across Canada under the age of 15. Aiden was this year's youngest finalist and performed Katy Perry's Firework in the Top 16 performance episode. She said one of the best parts of performing was that she got to do it in front of the judges.

"The judges were really nice, and they made me feel very special," she said. "They gave me really good feedback, and they said they could tell I enjoyed performing."

Aviva Frenkel, the producer of The Next Star, said the best part of her job is meeting kids like Aviva every year and helping them develop their talent.

"It's all good and positive. It's about building up, not tearing down like other competition shows," Frenkel said. "I get invested in the kids and I get to know them."

Frenkel has produced other Canadian reality shows, including Project Runway Canada and Are You Smarter Than a Canadian Fifth Grader?

Aiden Shufman

She said the diverse contestants of The Next Star often surprise her with their talent and personality, and Aiden was no exception.

"Aiden's like a 10-year-old wonder," she said. "You could feel like you're talking to a 10-year-old, and then she gets onstage it's like a seasoned professional."

Frenkel added that Aiden is the classic example of the kind of kid the show tries to find – one who has talent but also has a great personality. She said that people like the show because the whole family enjoys it, and she added that it fulfils a fantasy for many people.

"There's an aspect of celebrity to it," Frenkel said. "I think it's like everyone's mini dream to become a star."

Aiden said she felt like a star during the competition and that being on YTV was really cool, especially knowing that her friends and family were watching her. She said her friends thought it was really cool that she was on TV and they watched all the episodes.

She said that being on TV didn't make her nervous at all. "I actually get more nervous with just one person, so with lots of people I'm not really nervous at all," Aiden said.

Before auditioning for The Next Star, Aiden had performance experience as a ballroom dancer. she was a member of her school's glee club and she was a member of the Upper Canada Choir.

She had some advice for kids who want to audition for the show next year. "You need to believe in your dreams and try your best," Aiden said.

She wasn't one of The Next Star's Top 6 finalists, but she plans to continue singing.

"I want to get more experience singing and performing in front of people," she said.

Manilow to rock out and sing hits at T.O. show

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

When singer-songwriter Barry Manilow returns to Toronto for the Black Creek Music Festival this month, expect to hear two songs that are a departure from the upbeat material that made him famous.

His new CD, 15 Minutes, features electric guitar arrangements that make him sound more like a rock singer than the romantic balladeer who's known for singing the 1970s hit Mandy.

The album 15 Minutes is about a fictional guitar player who becomes famous, deals with the ups and downs of stardom and the many temptations of success that drive many, such as the late singer-songwriter Amy Winehouse, to a tragic end. Manilow's character has a positive end, hoping to rebound from taking success for granted.

Because Manilow has released 15 Minutes on his record label and because he recorded mostly standards with much success over the past decade, the new sound of the album is risky.

"I don't want to do an album because it is safe for sales. To be safe is to be dead. I was eager and ready to be a songwriter again, and this album is perfect," said Manilow in a phone interview.

"My lyrical collaborator, Enoch Anderson, and I saw how harassed Britney Spears was when she was followed by the paparazzi and we both wondered, 'Is this the price of fame?' So, we ran with this idea, and I wanted the songs to have guitar arrangements and to be more than pretty love songs that I have come to be known for."

The 16-song CD has met both commercial and critical success since it was released in June. The album debuted on the U.S. Billboard charts at No. 7.

For those who prefer a more traditional Manilow sound, he will perform plenty of his hits, such as Copacabana and Weekend in New England, at his upcoming concerts, both in Toronto on Aug. 24 and at Caesars casino in Windsor on Aug. 28.

"I will have two songs from 15 Minutes in the concerts, as the audiences in my Las Vegas shows have reacted positively to the songs. But most of those coming want to hear the hit songs, and I never, ever get tired of performing them or pleasing my fans."

Although Manilow understands the perils of fame, he personally has never experienced the low points of stardom. Growing up Jewish in a close-knit family from Brooklyn has helped him avoid the pitfalls of fame.

"You can't fall into the trap of forgetting your old friends and family when you become famous. I always go back and listen to the people I know who have been close to me for years to make sure I stay grounded."

Manilow has become a legend, who, at 68, still has an impeccable voice that resonates with emotion. For his shows in Toronto and Windsor, he will be accompanied by the Youngstown Symphony Orchestra.

Manilow was raised by his mother, Edna, and his grandparents, Esther and Joseph Manilow, Jewish immigrants from Russia who raised Barry in a small Brooklyn apartment. Although born as Barry Pincus, he changed his surname to Manilow shortly before his bar mitzvah out of love for his zaide.

Manilow's first instrument was the accordion and later he moved on to the piano – he got one as a bar mitzvah gift.

For a time, life was traumatic for Manilow both financially and emotionally. He nearly went bankrupt twice and had married and divorced his high school sweetheart by the age of 25.

Early in his career, he coached singers who wanted to audition on Broadway and he wrote commercial jingles. Then he became Bette Midler's musical director, and he went on to produce her first album, and many more for several singers, before releasing his own in 1973.

Very little has gone wrong in Manilow's career since. In addition to selling 80 million albums over his career, he showed his theatrical flair by co-writing a musical based on his hit song Copacabana, which was also made into movie for television.

Another show he wrote, Harmony, based on the lives of a musical group who lived in Nazi Germany in the 1930s, failed to make Broadway despite positive reviews when the show debuted in San Diego in 1997.

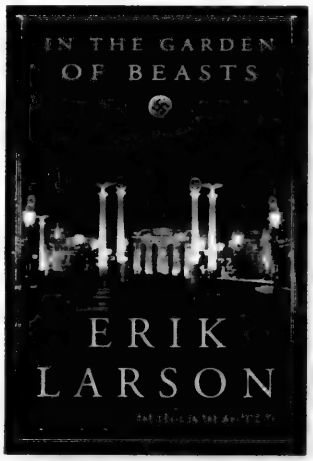
Although Manilow is in Canada this month, he has stopped doing year-long tours and performs mainly at the Paris in Las Vegas near his home in Palm Springs, Calif.

For tickets to the Toronto concert, at the Black Creek Music Festival at Rexall Centre on Aug. 24, 8 p.m., call 1-888-860-7888 or go to www.blackcreekfestival.com. For tickets to the Windsor concert on Aug. 28, 8 p.m, call 1-800-991-7777 or go to www.caesarwindsor.com.

Book reveals the dark soul of a nation

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

William E. Dodd, the United States' newly appointed ambassador to Germany in 1933, was a Jeffersonian democrat, a history professor working on a volume on the old American South, and a Sunday farmer with old-fashioned values who seemed so out of step with his new posting that one magazine called him "a square academic peg in a round diplomatic hole."



While Dodd had his opponents in the State Department, he enjoyed the confidence of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, and so moved with his wife and two grown children, Martha and Bill, into a stately mansion at 27A Tiergartenstrasse to serve as the American representative to Berlin in the early days of Hitler's Third Reich.

In The Garden of Beasts: Love, Terror, and an American Family in Hitler's Berlin (Crown) is author Erik Larson's gripping and remarkably full account of the Dodd's time in Berlin as they uncovered Germany's heart of darkness. It is a story of naive innocents who repeatedly fail to comprehend – but ultimately discover to their horror – that the "new Germany" was not the exciting, attractive, socially progressive place that it initially seemed, but rather a vicious totalitarian regime descending into barbarism.

Finding rich veins of material in Dodd's papers, Martha's memoir and diverse other sources, Larson spotlights the activities of the hapless ambassador and his daughter in alternating chapters. Dodd at first optimistically attempts to spread American values and appease Hitler's unquenchable wrath, even going so far as to tell Hitler that the United States, too, has a Jewish problem of its own. (Indeed, some State Department bureaucrats felt the embassy had too many Jews on its payroll for the Nazis' liking.)

Martha, who was recently separated from her American husband, engages in a series of ill-advised affairs under the embassy roof, some consummated in the library because of its comfortable couch. One liaison involves Rudolf Diels, the scar-faced chief of the Gestapo; a more prolonged romance involves Boris Winogradov, an official of the Soviet Embassy. "This was not a house, but a house of ill repute," the Dodds' butler would observe. At one point, Martha is even set up for a date (in a public bar) with Hitler, who kisses her hand. Hitler up close has a weak and soft face with pouches under the eyes, Martha would record, but his eyes "were startling and unforgettable... intense, unwavering, hypnotic."

Hitler, Goebbels and other high-ranking Nazis delighted in deceiving gullible diplomats like Dodds, assuring them they sought only peace even as they built up what was by far the biggest standing army in Europe.

All Germans, but not foreigners, were required to give the "Heil Hitler!" salute to passing stormtroopers on parade. When Dodd complained that stormtroopers had roughed up some visiting Americans who preferred to window-shop rather than salute, propaganda minister Josef Goebbels mollified him by explaining that the Jewish-controlled press had greatly exaggerated such incidents. But attacks against visiting Americans, like those against Jews, only grew in number. It took him a while, but Dodd finally saw that the land of Goethe and Beethoven had reverted to some bestial primeval stage of civilization and that Hitler's government was "nothing but a horde of criminals and cowards."

Martha, however, remained blind to the Nazi menace, even as it manifested itself before her eyes. One day at a parade in Nuremberg, she witnessed stormtroopers drag a woman through the street as punishment for being betrothed to a Jew. Her hair shorn, her face and head covered with white powder, the woman wore a placard that said "I have offered myself to a Jew." Even after this outrageous display, she was still enthralled by the Nazi movement, which for her had a rosy-cheeked freshness about it that she found irresistible. "The excitement of the people was contagious and I 'heiled' as vigorously as any Nazi," she would write. What finally knocked the rose-coloured spectacles from her eyes was an internal power struggle within the Gestapo that forced her friend, the Mephistolean Diels, to flee for his life. She was afterwards so terror stricken that she begged her mother to sleep in the same room with her.

The so-called Night of the Long Knives, a Nazi purge that saw countless party insiders and opponents murdered as enemies of the Reich, only deepened the family's revulsion; many of the victims had attended the Dodds' soirees at the embassy. Afterwards a new phrase made the rounds in Berlin: "Lebst du noch?" "Are you still among the living?"

In October 1933, Dodd courageously gave a speech to the American Chamber of Commerce in Berlin that, using historical examples but not mentioning Germany, warned of the danger of "arbitrary and minority government." He was widely applauded, but the State Department rebuked him because, as a privileged guest in Germany, he was not supposed to make even veiled criticism of his hosts. Later he went on holiday rather than attend – and thus lend credibility to – a big Nazi rally in Nuremberg. The State Department, ever unwilling to give offence, sent another representative in his stead.

Dodd further rankled his Washington colleagues by declaring he would not attend another of Hitler's speeches nor invite any high-ranking Nazi to the embassy. "What in the world is the use of having an ambassador who refuses to speak to the government to which he is accredited?" one railed. Removed from his position in 1937, Dodd returned to the United States where he correctly prognosticated that Germany would soon take over Austria, Poland and Czechoslovakia. He also spoke of the Fuehrer's ambition to murder the Jewish race.

Readers of Larson's previous non-fiction book – The Devil in the White City – were introduced to a mass murderer who operated at the Chicago World's Fair in 1893. In the Garden of Beasts is even more chilling because it reveals the dark soul of not just one but a whole nation of psychopathic killers whose demonic rampage would leave Europe and Russia strewn with millions of dead.

Fifty-year-old women hold their own in slo-pitch

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

When a team of mostly 50-something year old women competes in the Pitch for Israel tournament on Aug. 21, they're sure to be a force to reckon with.

The Giants, members of North York Women's Slo-Pitch league, started up about five years ago as a social and recreational activity for the women.

Joy Koplowitz, 52, who plays outfield, catcher and relief pitcher, said the team was coached in the beginning by her husband, Marc, who "took us to a place where we knew how to think baseball.

"We have never stopped learning. All we want to do is get better. He taught us to be cognitively flexible so that we can play a number of positions but favour a certain one. Our strategy is to get good at one or two positions." Janet Botham, 44, a team member who plays shortstop and second base, has played fastball since she was a girl. "We've come [miles] since our first-ever game, when we lost 35-0. We were mercied every inning. Now we hold our own against women in their 20s and 30s. We have even beaten that first team.

The Giants

"We practise every Sunday morning, and six of us went to West Palm Beach, Fla., in the spring for five days of spring training," Botham said. "We hired a hitting coach, who brought a pitching machine, and we went out every morning. It was very hot, but we practised."

The team now coaches themselves, she said, and different people bring different skills. There are no formal tryouts, but they're selective about who they recruit, Koplowitz said.

"We took Janet, who started this season, because we needed a hitter, and she is a hitter."

Fran Grundman, 53, came aboard – there are 15 team members and they field 10 at a time – because another player approached her. "I hadn't played since I was at camp, but I was drawn in by the camaraderie. The team is serious about baseball, but it is inclusive and fun," she said.

"I learned what to do if the ball comes to me, or if the ball doesn't come to me. You have to do something every play."

Former Dalhousie hoops star signed by Maccabi Haifa

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Maccabi Haifa Basketball team last week added some Jewish-Canadian content to its roster when it signed Simon Farine, a former all-star guard for the Dalhousie Tigers, to a two-year deal.

The Toronto-born Farine, 24, impressed Maccabi Haifa scouts at a tryout camp in Florida earlier this summer.

While playing for Dalhousie University, where he majored in business management, Farine was a three-time MVP. In his final season, he amassed 501 points, 124 assists and 58 steals.

The six-foot-two Farine was made the Tigers' captain in his senior year and was an AUS first-team all-star, a CIS second-team all-Canadian and earned MVP of the AUS Final 6 tournament.

He will be making aliyah to play with Maccabi Haifa and already has an Israeli passport, because his father is Israeli.

Speaking to The CJN last week, Farine said he was looking forward to his new life in Israel and reminisced about his time in Halifax.

"My four years at Dal were some of the best years of my life, both on and off the court. But I'm excited [to move to Haifa]. It's coming pretty quick. I've been working a little bit on my Hebrew, taking online classes and getting a little better," he said, noting that he's leaving next week.

Farine was last in Israel in 2009 for the Maccabiah Games as part of the Canadian contingent, he said.

Asked how he felt about being picked up by the Israeli Super League team, Farine said Haifa is one of the "really good organizations" in Israeli sports.

"These are people I want to play for. They treat me well as a Canadian. I'm going to come into [camp] in shape and be ready to play and try and make an impact. They want me to hit my open shots and play good, hard defence and work my butt off," he said.

Simon Farine

While he hasn't yet met any of his teammates, Farine said he's thrilled at the thought of playing alongside some of the talent the team has already assembled.

According to Maccabi Haifa's website, Farine will join a roster that includes former University of Virginia guard Sylven Landesberg, former Marshall University forward Tyler Wilkerson, former Southern Miss guard Jeremy Wise, former University of South Carolina forward Carlos Powell, Israeli guard Avi Ben-Chimol and Israeli National Olympic team members forward Daniel Aidan and guard Tamir Arieli.

Last week, Maccabi Haifa also signed former New Jersey Nets centre Sean Williams to a two-year contract.

Farine called that signing "huge."

"Not only so that he can be on my team and I get to play with somebody who was in the NBA, but I think it's great for the whole league. It should be quite a fun year," he said.

And Maccabi Haifa's coaching staff seemed equally excited about acquiring Farine.

"We were very impressed with Simon Farine at the U.S. tryouts," Maccabi Haifa head coach Mickey Gorka said in a statement. "Simon shined among excellent competition at the U.S. tryouts in South Florida. He's a physical guard, strong rebounder, with a nice touch from mid-range and will add depth to our roster this season."

Farine said he hopes he can help his new team have a winning season.

"I think I'm bringing toughness… to both ends of the court. I can hit open shots and score when needed, and just hold everything together."

He said he couldn't wait to get to Israel.

"It's a beautiful country."

Actor challenges himself with every new role

Laura Fixman
Intern

Actor Josh Epstein said that he tries to bring as much depth to his musical roles as he does to his Shakespearean roles.

Epstein, 31, is currently performing at the Stratford Festival in Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus, as Quintus, and in The Grapes of Wrath, as part of the ensemble cast.

He said one of the advantages of performing at Stratford is having access to expert coaches, including vocal and movement coaches. He also enjoyed the longer-than-usual rehearsal process, which he said allowed him to step away from the material and get an in-depth understanding of Quintus.

"I also love being part of great theatre companies," Epstein said. "At the Stratford Festival, I get to be in a company with some of the greatest actors in the country."

The Vancouver native began acting at eight years old in a production of Peter Pan. He said that he remembers getting in trouble for showing up in the wrong costume and fooling around backstage, which he joked wasn't that different from now.

"It was a more innocent time. I was just showing up and enjoying myself," Epstein said. "It's all about getting back to that."

Some of Epstein's recent roles include Barfee in The 25th Annual Putnam County Spelling Bee, Seymour in Little Shop of Horrors and Freddy in Dirty Rotten Scoundrels, which he said is his favourite performance because it was physical, comedic and dramatic, a combination of everything he could do.

Epstein likes to take on different roles so that people don't always see him as good at only one thing. "People want to take something you do really well and keep you in that role," he said, "I always want to take it to the next level, and with every show and every part I play, I probably work harder."

After high school, Epstein pursued another passion by getting his bachelor of commerce from the University of British Columbia in 2001. He has also written plays, and in 2009, he started a production company called Motion 58 Entertainment. He said that writing and producing has become just as important to him as performing.

Josh Epstein

"I get a thrill out of using both sides of my brain again," he said. "It's added so much more to this profession."

The production company was awarded the National Screen Institute's Drama Prize for 2010 for the short film Wait for Rain, which will have its world première at a film festival later this year. A feature film is in development with Chorus Entertainment. Epstein is also developing a TV series with Andrew Woodward and Josh Ramsay of the rock band Mariana's Trench.

He has won several awards, including the 2009 Ovation Award for lead actor for playing Leo in The Producers. He was also nominated for Vancouver Jessie Awards for his roles in Dirty Rotten Scoundrels, Much Ado About Nothing and Alice: A Wonderland.

In 2010, Epstein was featured as a singer at the Winter Olympics, which he said he knew he wanted to be a part of because it was in his hometown. "We entertained throngs of people and it was the best two weeks of my life," he said.

Epstein wants to continue acting and taking on bigger roles, as well as develop his production company further. He said he'd love to play the lead in Parade, and he's always wanted to be Hamlet. He's currently working on a Hamlet monologue, and he said he keeps imagining himself playing the role.

"I love playing stuff that's not typical for me," Epstein said. "I wouldn't be the first considered for it, so I'd make a different kind of Hamlet."

He has been in many musical productions. He said that he loves music and listens to music throughout the day, but approaches musicals from an acting perspective.

He added that no matter what kind of show he's doing, he always gets a little nervous at some point. "I could be feeling fine all day, but the second I walk on stage I get a bit of butterflies," he said.

"If I didn't get nervous, I wouldn't be living life to the fullest because emotions, whether they're good or bad, are what we live off of."

Epstein said that people starting their careers shouldn't be afraid of new challenges. "You need to find your own path," he said. "Don't be afraid of what you're good at, but also don't be afraid to challenge yourself at what you're not good at."

He said his family has been very supportive of his career. They come to all his shows, and he added that his sister's first question to him is always whether he has the lead role. He said that his father, who died two years ago, is his biggest inspiration.

"I feel like he's with me every time I go onstage," Epstein said.

'Your mom is a famous actor'

"Why?" I'm standing in my daughter's room. "Why didn't you choose me to lecture at the youth camp's event?"

The little one moves uneasily. "Mom, it's not really for you," she whispers.

I'm furious. She picked her dad to lecture at career day, or something, tomorrow. Him, over me.

"But your dad is just an engineer, whereas your mom is a famous actor and writer!"

The girl looks at me. "Famous, Mom?" she asks skeptically.

"Yes! In Israel, I couldn't walk two blocks without people recognizing me and asking for my autograph!"

"Mom," says the girl, "I don't remember anyone recognizing you back then, or now, and the only autographs you gave were to store clerks, when you were paying with cheques."

I think a little. "Yeah, but remember? Next to the autographs, I always wrote, 'Yours sincerely'"

There, I have a case here.

"Mom, anyway, here you're not..."

I cut her short. "I'm gonna be rich and famous, rich and famous!"

We take a break as I cry a little, then my 11-year-old puts my head on her lap. "There, there," she says.

"Mom, the counsellor said Daddy should come. What can I do?"

I begin to feel anger rising. "Your dear counsellor, is she by any chance the one who teaches drama?" My girl nods hesitantly. "I knew it!" I shout. "It's because I didn't cast her in my play! She's simply holding a grudge, that miserable little..."

"No!" my girl cuts in. "She doesn't want to act on stage, only on TV."

"Sure!" I shout bitterly. "Why not? And if she ever thought I'd help her to get there, she can think again! I mean, true, I'm not exactly in the position of..."

"Mom! Her dad is a very important manager in Canadian TV. She'll manage without our help."

I sob a little, not knowing why, then pretty much knowing. "Please don't tell me that's the same counsellor I called 'Stalin!' to her face.

The girl, again, put her tiny arms around my head, "Well, you said they have the same attitude and moustache. It's not your fault she has such sensitive hearing..."

I say, "Any way, people sometimes have bad memories. Beside, I'm an Israeli. We're known to have a unique sense of humour. Tell her I was just joking and hand her my résumé."

We sit together on her bed quietly for a while.

"You know, baby, one of these days, and it won't be long, people will kill for my appearance at their youth camps! That counsellor of yours, who, by the way, I'm still convinced wanted a part in my play, will kiss my you-know-what to get me lecturing, instead of your boring engineer dad!"

My girl looks at me sadly. "But, Mom, I've been trying to tell you all along – no mom is invited. Why else would they call tomorrow: 'A day with my dad'"?

Seniors' building celebrates 10 years

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Monty Mazin and his wife, Blema, made a move 10 years ago that changed their lives.

The couple, who had lived in an apartment for 25 years, moved into Baycrest's then brand-new condominium building, known as Two Neptune Drive.

The building, a 120-unit life-lease building designed for active and independent seniors, is now known as the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community.

The life-lease concept enables seniors to maintain a right to occupy their residence. At any time, the resident can sell this right at an appraised market value and keep the proceeds from the sale.

The facility was named for Cipin, who lives there with his wife, Sharyn Gunter, after his daughter and son-in-law, Marla and Aubrey Dan, donated $5 million to the Baycrest Foundation in 2001 in gratitude for providing the building. Twenty per cent of the income on the donation goes into an endowment fund for use by the residents of Two Neptune Drive.

Mazin, 84, a journalist who worked in public relations, said he became vice-president of the resident council almost immediately. "One of my accomplishments was starting a shuttle bus service to No Frills at [Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue.]

"The people in the building have become my second family. I can't walk down the hall without seeing a friend. You're never isolated here."

Some of the activities in the building include movie afternoons, exercise classes, discussion groups, Shabbat sing-a-longs, a garden club, and conversational Hebrew.

Cipin, 83, who was a lawyer in Alberta for 40 years, has lived in the building for almost 10 years.

He said, his wife Sharyn formed the resident council when they moved in. "We both got involved because that is our nature. We made things happen. We suggested activities, and pushed [Baycrest] to do things such as plant greenery, improve the sound system in the [social hall], and install a washroom in the ninth-floor games room."

There's a community feeling to the building, he said, "because we've made it that way. We worked hard to get things going."

A dinner was held at the building to celebrate its 10th anniversary.

Israelis react to Eilat attacks

They may hold dual citizenship, but many Israelis who have a second passport say last week's terror attacks along the Israeli-Egyptian border won't send them packing.

"Whenever I see or hear news of something like this, I feel a mixture of outrage, helplessness and resignation. But no, terrorism doesn't make me consider returning to the United States. I didn't have those thoughts during the worst days of the intifadah, and I don't have them now," said Sam Ser, who moved to Jerusalem from Chicago in 1998.

There's no doubt Israelis are apprehensive that the recent attacks are the start of a new wave of violence. The attacks by members of the Gaza-based Popular Resistance Committees, an organization with ties to Hamas, were carried out from Sinai along the border north of Eilat on Israeli Route 12, in an area frequently used for illegal immigration and smuggling.

Word on the street is that if the Palestinians and Hamas decide to engage in terror – regardless of Israeli security measures – then there will be more attacks on Israelis.

"I do believe that a new round has just begun, but I never felt it was over, just that their attempts had failed," said Amos Fabian, a Holon resident.

"I'm both worried and mad," said Omri Rosenkrantz, a lecturer at the Open University of Israel. "I feel like the Palestinians are using Israel's democratic western nature to do whatever they want, which is mainly wage terror attacks on Israeli cities. The situation in Egypt didn't really help making things easier in the southern border, and it doesn't look like it's getting better anytime soon."

"You hear about wars breaking out pretty quickly, and it makes you... question everything," said Rachel Lasry Zehavi, who grew up in Toronto and now lives in Beit Yitzhak. "My son has a Canadian passport and citizenship. But we're staying – it's not because of this I'd want to get up and leave. Life is difficult because of the economy. Security alone wouldn't make me leave."

Amir Mizroch, editor of the English newsletter edition of Israel Hayom (www.israelhayom.com), said the news worries him. "I'm not ashamed to say there's an element of insecurity," Mizroch said. "When you have these reports of an attack here, a shooting there, there's a feeling of 'Oh no, here we go again.' It's even worse now because we became part of the Arab Spring, in the new Middle East, we rose up as a nation against economic issues.

New Eligibility

TORONTO — Germany has issued a revised directive on payments to victims of persecution for work in a Nazi-era ghetto that was not forced labour, the German Consulate in Toronto announced last week. Under an old directive of October 2007, a victim had no right to the payment if work in the ghetto had already been taken into account in another pension. Under the new directive, those who chose to work can apply even if they get a pension. To apply, go to www.badv.bund.de/antrag/Antragsformular_en.pdf.

Mohel Marks 4,500th

KIEV — A mohel in Ukraine has performed his 4,500th ritual circumcision. Rabbi Yaacov Gaissinovitch, a Chabad-Lubavitch emissary who also is a doctor, officiated at the landmark circumcision this month, the Jewish community of Dnepropetrovsk announced. Rabbi Gaissinovitch has been a mohel for 13 years and often travels around Ukraine and Moldova to perform a brit. He sometimes performs five a day. Chabad.org reported that he once performed 22 in a day at a local summer camp – with parents' OK.

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Google released a toolbar feature it developed in Israel. Google Related, for the Google Chrome toolbar and Google Toolbar for Internet Explorer, gives additional information about related websites. It was developed at Google's Israel R&D centre.

Kibbutz Planned

NEW YORK — A dozen members of Habonim Dror, the North American Labor-Zionist youth movement, said they intend to make aliyah and found a kibbutz. Seven Americans and five Canadians in Habonim Dror (the Builders of Freedom), a movement founded in 1935, will make aliyah next month and live together in a so-called urban kibbutz. Hoping to emulate the kibbutz model of old, the young new Israelis will pool their income and make decisions by consensus. They will cook and share religious meals, celebrate holidays and study together. "We care deeply about the people of Israel and... we have faith in the progressive Zionist dream of Herzl, Ben Gurion, A.D. Gordon and others," said member George Stevens, of Philadelphia, in a statement. "We see rising tensions between Jews and Arabs and the erosion of the social safety net, and we want to work toward a society based on co-operation and mutual responsibility instead."

Chanel Denies Founder's Nazi Past

NEW YORK — A U.S. group of Shoah survivors slammed the fashion house Chanel for rejecting a new biography's claim that founder Coco Chanel was a Nazi spy.

Elan Steinberg, vice-president of the American Gathering of Holocaust Survivors, said that his organization was "shocked" by the charges in Sleeping with the Enemy: Coco Chanel's Secret War, by Hal Vaughan, and "the blithe and unsupported rejection of these charges by the Chanel fashion house."

Coco Chanel

The book builds on past evidence to describe the secret life of Chanel, a fashion icon, as a "fierce" antisemite recruited by German military intelligence, as well as the lover of Baron Hans Gunther von Dincklage, described as a "Nazi master spy." The Chanel group denied the allegations beyond that "she had a relationship with a German aristocrat during the war" and further denied that she was antisemitic based on her friendship with Jews and business ties with the Rothschild family.

Steinberg said that the documents "are too serious and historically important to be cavalierly dismissed by the fashion house without any effort to confirm their veracity through objective research."

Car accident left popular teacher a quadriplegic

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — In a split second, Rabbi Yehuda Simes' life was changed forever.

It has been over a year since an automobile accident left him a quadriplegic and changed the course of his life, a very long year filled with pain and suffering, fear and sadness, but somehow also with hope, happiness and gratitude.

The popular and well-loved teacher at Ottawa's Hillel Academy was returning home from a trip to the United States with his wife, Shaindel, and seven of their eight children. After they swerved to avoid a deer, their vehicle rolled over. Shaindel, who was seven months pregnant at the time, had been driving. She was slightly injured, and the children were all fine, but Rabbi Simes was very seriously injured.

Following emergency surgery and some time in a Syracuse, N.Y., trauma centre, he was flown back to Ottawa, where the long and difficult journey to recovery began. He was on a ventilator, had a feeding tube and had virtually no mobility.

Bad news travels fast, and as word spread about Rabbi Simes' condition, the Ottawa community rallied. Financial help, emotional support and assistance with all sorts of domestic chores came from individuals and groups. Students held a car wash and a garage sale, a charitable fund was set up, and people pitched in to cook, clean and help with child care.

Intra-communal tolerance (2)

From the editor's desk...

What is the extent of intra-communal tolerance for differing political opinions that we owe each other?

The question is not simply theoretical. As I wrote in this space last week, it demands immediate attention and answer from us because of the vocally expressed anger roiling in some quarters in the community over upcoming performances in Toronto by Mandy Patinkin and Theodore Bikel, renowned entertainers, proudly identified as Jews, both of whom support the refusal by some Israeli artists to perform in the West Bank city of Ariel.

Some members of the community are lobbying to have the performances cancelled. In doing so, have they gone too far?

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), the advocacy arm of the Jewish federation system, entered the public debate by issuing a policy statement that responds to the specific, substantive aspect of the political opinion expressed by the visiting artists as well as the general, overarching issue underpinning the free exchange of opinion and idea.

For reasons that they explain in the statement itself, they "reject all boycotts against Israel." They therefore disagree with the views adopted by Patinkin and Bikel and say so: "we profoundly disagree with their promotion of such boycotts."

At the same time however, federation and CIJA state plainly that the freedom to express individual opinion is sacrosanct: "[W]e respect the rights of those artists and performers to express their views."

And of course, we also express our individuality by the performers we choose to see. And this expression of our freedoms was also enshrined in the federation-CIJA statement. "We also understand that community members will make their own choices about artists they wish to see and support."

The statement by federation and CIJA clearly implies, by its very deliberate and precise language, that trying to shut the performances down is beyond the boundaries of their policy. We can reasonably infer from their statement, therefore, that they do not condone a publicly advocated boycott of the boycotters. On the other hand, an individual decision to boycott the performances – that is, to ignore them – is entirely acceptable.

The UJA-CIJA statement tries to balance the important contending concerns tearing at the loyalties and consciences within the community. It is appropriate that it does, and it does so in the right way.

Of course we will have differences of opinion within the community. It is too trite even to write that. Differences of opinion are the very essence of the debates and the discussions that comprise and fill the pages of the Talmud. Differences of opinion have been the pith and substance of every conversation around every Shabbat dinner table.

The key is how we deal with our differences. Normally, we settle our differences of opinion through polite or aggressive, respectful or irreverent, but also usually tolerant, argument.

But these are not normal times. Israel is under siege. Our stress levels are elevated. And thus our levels of mutual forbearance are, alas, diminished.

But prolonged levels of diminished mutual forbearance are perilous to our sense of collective peoplehood.

Our tradition offers a model of forbearance that we should try to adopt. It is the Passover table, to which we invite even the "wicked child." But what are the parameters that define the "wicked child" today? Is every opinion tolerable at the table?

Clearly not.

People who advocate the elimination of the Jewish state, for example, are well past the status of the "wicked child." For, to deny the right of the Jews to have their own state is to deny Jewish faith and Jewish history. And we must also have no doubt that those who accuse Israel of being an apartheid state, to name just one tactic of delegitimization, are advocating the elimination of the Jewish state.

But we must give wide latitude to the free expression of conscience before we brand someone beyond "the wicked child." And we must certainly avoid what our history has always disdained: McCarthyesque accusations against "the wicked child." We do not demonize. That is what our enemies do and have done throughout our history.

I do not agree with Bikel's or Patinkin's views concerning the Jewish communities in the West Bank. Nor do I think the public pronouncement of their opinions was helpful to the very cause they champion.

But their views are entirely within the mainstream of the heated, impassioned, emotional, even infuriating political discussion today among Jews inside and outside of Israel.

Theodore Bikel and Mandy Patinkin hold significantly different political views than I do, for example. But they are not less supportive of Israel than I am.

They belong at our Passover table.

Canada expresses support for Israel after attacks

Compiled by CJN staff

The Canadian government and Canada's Jewish community sent messages of support to Israel in the wake of last week's terror attacks near Eilat.

John Baird

In a statement last Friday, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird condemned the attacks "in the strongest terms."

"These cowardly attacks, particularly on civilian targets, are abhorrent and criminal. On behalf of all Canadians, I send my heartfelt condolences to those affected by today's vicious attacks.

He added that Canada supports Israel's right to "defend itself against such terrorist acts in conformity with international humanitarian law. Those responsible for these horrific attacks must be held accountable."

In their own separate statements on Aug. 18, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC), and Federation CJA in Montreal all joined in decrying the attacks and in sending messages of support to Israelis.

CIJA chairman David Koschitzky said the attacks show how vulnerable Israelis are to terrorism.

"It is no coincidence that this occurs alongside the deteriorating situation in Syria, and Hezbollah's unabated military build-up in south Lebanon. The dangers surrounding Israel are interconnected, and the world cannot ignore these overarching threats to regional stability," he said.

"Our thoughts are with the victims of these horrific attacks, and we pray for a quick and full recovery for the wounded."

Federation CJA president Jack Hasen, said Canadians "cannot help but realize how fragile and unstable the lives of our Israeli friends and family are, and we know that it is essential for us to continue to stand with Israel, at all times, but especially during these all too common tragedies."

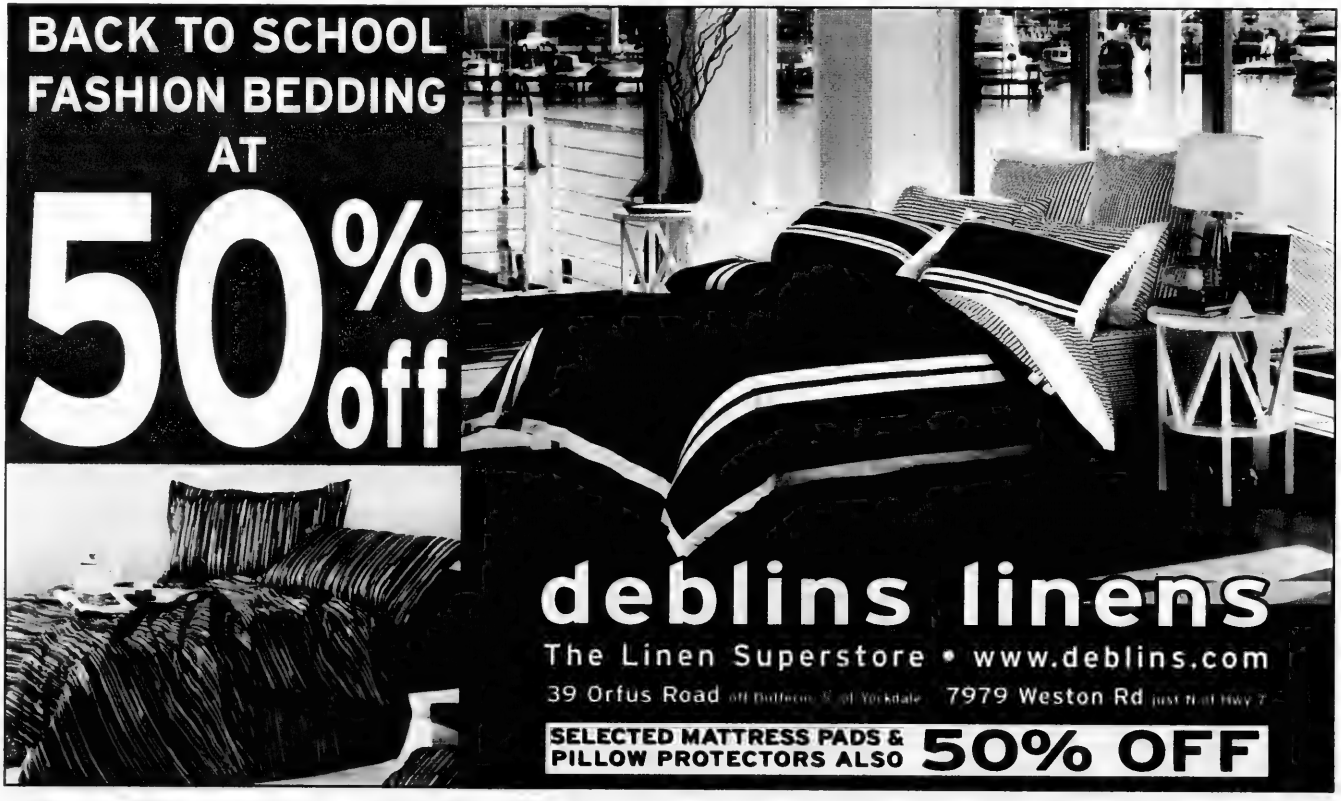
Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the FSWC, called the attacks a "slaughter of innocent civilians" by Palestinian terrorists.

"This tragic slaughter should be a wake-up call to all UN member states that the leaders of Gaza intend to carry out their oft-stated goal of killing as many Israelis as possible and will never be partners in peace."

In another statement, the World Jewish Congress (WJC) also denounced the attacks.

Israel's president Shimon Peres embraces Sima Naftali, widow of IDF Sergeant Moshe Naftali, who was killed in a terror attack while patrolling the Israeli-Egyptian border, in southern Israel last week. [Flash 90 photo]

WJC President Ronald S. Lauder called on the UN to develop an action plan "to fight growing terrorism in the region. Without security on the ground, it is futile to engage in lofty discussions about peace between Israel and the Palestinians."



AGO vault houses priceless Lodz ghetto photos

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Thousands of unique and priceless photographs of the Lodz ghetto yet to be exhibited have been stored in a vault in the Art Gallery of Ontario for the past four years.

The photographs of everyday life and deportations in the last ghetto in German-occupied Poland to be liquidated by the Nazis were taken by Henryk Ross on behalf of the Jewish Council, led by Chaim Rumkowski.

AGO has 2,430 prints and 3,000 negatives.

The AGO's collection, the only one of its kind in the world, consists of 2,430 gelatin silver prints and 3,000 negatives.

The collection was donated to the AGO by an anonymous donor in 2007.

The collection is stored in an air-conditioned vault deep within the bowels of the museum and kept in good archival conditions. It is off limits to the public, but copies of the originals have been sent to institutions and museums around the world.

"From my perspective, these photographs are of extreme historical value," said Maia-Mari Sutnik, the AGO's curator of photography, in an interview last week. "This is very emotional material. It may be difficult for people to understand the circumstances under which these photographs were taken."

In addition to the photographs, the collection comprises ghetto currency, stamps, newspapers and official announcements in Yiddish and German.

But the most important component in the collection are Ross' stark black-and-white photographs, which shed light on the ghetto's doomed Jewish inhabitants, the last of whom were deported to death camps in Poland 67 years ago this month.

Ross, born in Warsaw in 1910, was a sports photographer in Lodz – a centre of the textile industry – before the outbreak of World War II in 1939.

After the ghetto was established in 1940, Ross landed a job in the Jewish Council's department of statistics. His task was to take identity card photographs and photographs of Jewish workers producing goods for Germany's war effort.

At great risk to himself, he clandestinely took photographs of appalling conditions in the ghetto, where starvation and illness were rampant, and of deportations.

By his own estimate, he snapped about 10,000 photographs. In all probability, he used a 35 mm Leica camera, Sutnik said.

In August 1944, as the ghetto was being emptied, Ross buried his photographs, hoping to retrieve them one day.

But when he unearthed his cache a few months before the end of the war, he discovered that most of them had been badly damaged by the elements. The remainder were not in the best of condition, having been water-logged.

Maia-Mari Sutnik

After the war, Ross immigrated to Israel, where he was employed as a photographer. During the trial of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann, some of Ross' photographs were used as evidence to convict him.

In the wake of the celebrated trial, Ross published The Last Journey of the Jews of Lodz, a Hebrew-language book containing about 100 of his ghetto photographs, many on the deportations.

He died in 1991.

His son, a resident of the United States, sold his father's photographs – prints and negatives – to a Canadian collector from Toronto.

The collector, who prefers to remain anonymous and is not Jewish, donated the photographs and the ghetto currency, stamps, newspapers and official announcements to the AGO, which has 52,000 images in its photographic collection.

The collector is deeply interested in material that portrays conflict, war and personal life, said Sutnik, who completed a degree in art history at York University and graduated from the Ontario College of Art.

Sutnik is thinking of mounting an exhibit at the AGO in the not-too-distant future and plans to give a talk on the collection in November.

In the meantime, she said, the negatives may have to be placed in deep freeze because they are deteriorating, and the newspapers are in very fragile condition.

"We have a huge task in front of us," said Sutnik, whose family is originally from eastern Europe.

The AGO does not have any of the photographs of Mendel Grossman, another photographer who roamed the Lodz ghetto.

Grossman died toward the end of the war, and negatives of his photographs were found by his sister.

Some of the photographs were sent to Israel for safe-keeping, but were lost during the 1948 Arab-Israeli war.

Still other photographs were saved by Grossman's friend, and are now housed in an Israeli Holocaust museum on a kibbutz in the Galilee.

JNF plans motorcycle ride for fire victims

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When David MacKinnon heard about the tragic forest fire in Israel that claimed the lives of 40 prison wardens last December, he felt he needed to honour them in some way.

"I felt absolutely terrible about it," said MacKinnon, a 57-year-old operational manager for Ontario's Ministry of Community Safety and Corrections Services.

"Being correctional officers themselves, getting killed, I just felt terrible," he said, fighting back tears. "I just couldn't imagine the horror that they went through in performance of their duty and dying doing it. It is just a terrible tragedy. I just felt like I had to do something."

It was Janet Miller, MacKinnon's wife, who informed him about the four-day forest fire that ravaged the Carmel region in northern Israel and killed 40 prison guards who were en route to evacuate the Damun Penitentiary when a fallen tree trapped their bus in the fire.

MacKinnon immediately contacted the Israeli consulate in Toronto, which directed him to Josh Cooper at JNF Toronto.

Cooper, JNF Toronto's executive director, said he recalled the day in December when MacKinnon called his office.

"He said when something happens to a police officer in the line of duty, the whole policing community gathers around the family, and rightfully so," Cooper said. "But there is nothing for prison wardens. And here were 40 prison wardens who were going to save prisoners, and he felt it was his duty to do something to honour them and if possible to help the families of the 40."

MacKinnon and Cooper spoke about planning an event to raise money for the families of the victims.

"We just began chatting, and I had mentioned that I was the president of the Hard Chargers Law Enforcement Motorcycle Club and discovered that we had a mutual interest. We both ride motorcycles," McKinnon said.

"I happen to belong to a Jewish motorcycle club called Golf Riders," Cooper said, adding that they decided to organize a fundraiser based on their shared love of motorcycle riding.

David MacKinnon

On Sept. 25, JNF Toronto will host its Correctional Officers Ride to raise money for a scholarship for the children of the victims of the fire.

Michael Charendoff, a 42-year-old Torontonian who was on a recent JNF leadership trip to Israel in July, is on the committee for the ride.

Charendoff, who is also a Golf Riders member, said he hopes the upcoming ride will become an annual event that will sustain the scholarship for years to come.

"These folks who perished, their families should get something. It won't replace them, but it will give them some support that they so rightfully deserve," he said.

"We'd also like to help build awareness about what JNF is all about, raise awareness about what happened there and make sure people don't forget and continue to support the families."

Rebecca Woods Baum, JNF Toronto's outreach and program co-ordinator, said the tentative plan is the two-hour ride will begin in the Jane Street and Highway 7 area.

"We're going to have a little ceremony for the fallen prison wardens, and then they'll go on the ride, and there'll be some raffle prizes and a lunch when they come back," she said.

The riders can register online on the JNF website, www.jnftoronto.ca. There's a registration fee of $25 for riders and $15 for passengers, and each rider has the opportunity to raise money through sponsorship.

"What we're really hoping for is that not only motorcyclists show up, but other people, families, show up, because it's not just about people riding their bikes, coming back and having something to eat. We want them to come and hear about what happened," Charendoff said.

He explained that during the JNF trip to Israel, their guide took them to the turn in the road near Kibbutz Beit Oren where the wardens were trapped on their way to evacuate the prisoners.

"It totally put it in perspective. Just to sit there and think about what these guys went through that day – it's awful, just awful. It meant so much to be able to go where this happened. Being a part of the committee to plan this event, it meant a lot to me."

MacKinnon, who has connections both with members of the law-enforcement community and the motorcycle-riding community, said bikers will be coming in from as far away as New York and Pennsylvania.

"The international president of the Hard Chargers, Steve Pollard, is coming from New Hampshire," MacKinnon said, adding he hopes this event will attract upward of 500 people.

Another notable attendee is Dundas, Ont., MP David Sweet, who is also a biker and the chair of the ride.

After Tahrir Square, the deluge

Six months and one week after Hosni Mubarak was deposed as president of Egypt, the Egyptian border yielded its first organized slaughter of Israelis. In a well-planned, co-ordinated series of attacks, Palestinian terrorists killed eight Israelis and wounded 30 more over the course of some eight hours on Aug 18.

The attacks were planned in the Gaza Strip and executed by terrorists who crossed from Gaza into Sinai through tunnels underneath the Gaza-Sinai border. They then travelled some 200 kilometres to the Sinai border area, protected by a flimsy wire fence, about 15 kilometres north of Eilat. During Mubarak's long tenure as president, a flimsy wire fence was usually sufficient to secure the two countries. Israeli security believes 15 to 20 terrorists took part in the attacks. The IDF killed five. Egyptian forces killed two. Most escaped. Typically, the terrorists first targeted unarmed civilians. They opened up fire on an Egged bus and on passing cars, killing and wounding indiscriminately. A long day of military responses ensued, involving a number of Israel's armed forces units to deal with the sophisticated, murderous onslaught.

Since Mubarak's fall from power, Israel's security situation in the south has rapidly deteriorated. Arms are regularly smuggled into Gaza from Sinai. The Egyptian army apparently has neither the ability nor the will to staunch the flow. The primary source of the weaponry has been from Iran via Sudan. Of late, weapons have also arrived into Gaza from the chaos that is Libya.

Terrorist groups and their supporters must be drooling with ghoulish delight at the myriad possibilities now available to them in the vast unguarded desert of Sinai to kill Jews. Israel cannot nor, obviously, will not tolerate the new dangerous status quo.

The Jewish state is building a 200-kilometre, high-tech fence along the border with Egypt. Thus far, 45 kilometres have been completed. The pace of further construction has been considerably expedited. But there is yet a great deal of death for terrorists to deliver until the fence is finished.

The White House immediately condemned the attacks "in the strongest terms," adding that it stands with Israel "united against terror, and we hope that those behind this attack will be brought to justice swiftly."

Indeed, the entire civilized world must stand with Israel united against terror. Israel is the democracies' bellwether. The terror aimed at Israel is also aimed at them, at us, at all societies that cherish freedom, the rule of law and the sanctity of life.

We had hoped that after Tahrir Square, a better society for Egyptians might evolve. To date, however, it has been the deluge.

Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres said the quick end to recent Soviet-Israeli talks in Helsinki caused him little worry. The Soviets said they were halted because Israel insisted on discussing internal Soviet matters, such as Jewish emigration and the USSR's treatment of its Jews. Moscow broke off diplomatic relations with Israel after the 1967 Six Day War.

The new JCC building

Rabbi Erwin Schild laments the "destruction" of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre as he criticizes the community for its decision to prioritize "opulence" over Jewish education ("On Tisha b'Av weep for the BJCC!" Aug. 4). Yet as I look out the window by my desk, in the (still-standing) Prosserman Jewish Community Centre, at the daycare, I can't help but feel that things are where they should be.

"Three hundred million dollars would go a long way toward providing for Jewish education," Rabbi Schild writes. "Does it make sense and is it morally and halachically defensible to destroy a serviceable, handsome and adequate building that could be repaired and renovated?" Perhaps not, but does it make sense to contribute $300 million toward Jewish education in Toronto when there are starving children in Sub-Saharan Africa? The answer is no, of course, and were we to base all of our charitable decisions on which cause needed the money most, few would continue to contribute to any worthy organizations.

The essence of philanthropy is passion, not utility. When donors in Toronto choose to contribute to the building of a new Jewish community centre, it is because that is their passion. I, unfortunately, cannot take personal responsibility for this "blinded, misguided, foolish and reckless… fiasco," although if I could truthfully do so, I would with pride – because the BJCC is my passion.

Tolerance (1)

I wish someone would explain to Mandy Patinkin that Israel fought a war it did not begin ("Intra-communal tolerance," Aug. 18). Fortunately for the State of Israel and for worldwide Jewry, it won that war. The West Bank was recognized under the British Mandate as part of a future Jewish state by the international community in the 20th century, and it is not illegal for the Israelis to be there. Someone should explain that the dispute can be settled only by negotiation between the parties, not by boycotts such as Patinkin proposes. Someone should ask Patinkin how the Israelis can negotiate when the Palestinians have no desire to negotiate or when people like him deter the possibility of negotiation.

Patinkin requires education in international law. I propose that every Jew allow him this time to learn by not attending his Toronto performance in September.

Tolerance (2)

Intra-communal tolerance works both ways, and Theodore Bikel shows zero tolerance by boycotting a Jewish community in Israel. Why not have Not in Our Name or Code Pink perform at the synagogue, or give speeches about why Israel is so wrong and the Palestinians are so right? Bikel would be wise to advise people to boycott anything made in countries whose leaders are against Israel.

Bombing Auschwitz was doable

In the column "Holocaust 101 at Yad Vashem" (Aug. 4), Sheldon Kirshner writes: "The Allies rejected a plea to bomb the rail lines leading to Auschwitz, claiming they could easily be repaired. They also claimed they had no aircraft with the range to reach Auschwitz. This was patently untrue. Allied planes had had already bombed Auschwitz subcamps."

From spring 1944, Allied bombers based in northern Italy were able to fly within the range of death camps in Poland. Of course, high-altitude bombing of Auschwitz would have raised the moral question of dropping deadly bomb loads and killing thousands of prisoners. The precision low-level bombing of the crematoria was doable and supported by the fact that in February 1944, under the code name Jericho, 19 British Mosquito bombers made a successful low-level bombing run on a prison in Amiens, France, breaching the walls, and facilitated the escape of French resistance fighters who were about to be executed. The option of bombing the crematoria would have been a fairly easy task. The Auschwitz complex did not have the same anti-aircraft protection as other targets in Germany or occupied Europe.

As a matter of fact, the German air defence headquarters for the Auschwitz sector complained to the German high command about the night cremations, when flames were shooting out from the chimneys of the five crematoria and could be seen for miles, as witnessed by American flyers.

The restructuring of communal advocacy

Why is the new way better than the old way?

Sally F. Zerker

I have taken the trouble to read through all the reports in the Canadian Jewish News about the recent restructuring of the Jewish community organizations, articles from 2010 leading up to and beyond July 1, 2011, when the reconfiguration of Jewish community advocacy structure officially began (so far known as CIJA 2.0). In all those articles, I never saw any indication that the Jewish people of Canada were consulted in any way on this dramatic transformation. Nowhere did I see evidence that the master plan of the restructuring committee regarding this major change was published for all to see. In this day and age, all that was needed was a website that showed all aspects of the plan and changes to it as they occurred. And comments and analyses should also have been welcomed.

It's important and very interesting to know the constitution of that critical committee. As reported in The CJN last month, the committee was composed of eight men, seven of whom were associated in either a professional or volunteer way with well-established Canadian Jewish organizations. One member of the committee was unaffiliated and was obviously from the community at large. United Jewish Appeal (UJA) was represented by two committee members. The president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) was on the committee. Two members were from the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), and one representative was from the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

I'm sure these men (they were only men, you'll notice) are respectable and responsible Jews, and I'm sure this committee was well-versed about and experienced in dealing with the Jewish community's bureaucracy. But with the exception of one organization, none of the others are directly linked to the community at large and certainly had no means for appraising public opinions regarding the drastic changes they were planning. The exception was Canadian Jewish Congress, which, to the best of my recollection, had a system of community participation for election of its officers every few years, although even that system seems to have been disbanded recently.

For this indifferent approach to have taken place, there had to be an assumption that this group could indeed represent the whole community. This confidence is reinforced by their argument that the Jewish community is best served when it has only one voice for advocacy, and that the new super-agency will be that appropriate speaker. Shimon Fogel, newly appointed CEO of this new organization, still known as CIJA 2.0, said it will be a top-down approach, in order to "clarify and simplify" messaging on Jewish advocacy. Apparently, grassroots input is not a priority at all.

It is this superior attitude that seemingly justifies the compression of historic and useful branches of the community into one body, never to be heard from again. The astonishingly strange fact is that this method of suppressing institutions and assigning authority to one organization has been tried before – indeed only seven years ago – in the form of CIJA itself, and, sadly, CIJA turned out to be a bust.

Oh, I know, these wise men, upon hearing my evaluation of CIJA, are shaking their heads in denial, saying that it was by no means a failure. But, of course, if CIJA had worked out well, by its own (not my) standards, they would have left well enough alone. There would have been no need to close down CJC, which has served the Jewish community pretty well for more than 90 years. Gone too are the CIC, the Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC), the University Outreach Committee (UOC) and National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL).

There are two claims about why the creation of this super-agency will be beneficial, and they're both wrong. First, the basic idea, that of a single voice for Jewish and Israel advocacy, is mistaken. I believe we need multiple voices, strong and aggressive voices, out in the open and certainly not hidden behind some mythical behind-the-scenes operation. It seems obvious to me that when we Jews as a community must defend ourselves from hostile and unfounded attacks, the defence is more effective if it comes from a myriad of sources rather than just one.

Secondly, the argument for this new form of advocacy is that the lines of distinction between the domestic agenda and the Israel agenda have blurred to the extent that it is really impossible to tell one from the other. According to Fogel, the need for reorganization stemmed from the belief that the lines between anti-Zionism and antisemitism have become indistinguishable, and, supposedly, a single agency is better equipped to sort out this "confusion." But if this was some kind of inhibiting factor for advocacy for the "old" organizations, why would CIJA 2.0 be better equipped to sort out this problem? In my opinion, this is not a good enough and/or valid reason for abolishing existing, functioning institutions and firing many experienced and dedicated workers – significantly, at a cost of very expensive compensation packages, for which the Jewish community is obligated. Moreover, I think it's important that the community be informed what this obligation is costing us.

This new Canadian Jewish advocacy program is, in my opinion, now in deep trouble. When CIJA came into being in 2004, its authority over the other agencies was very significant, because it held the purse strings, to the tune of $11 million. Nevertheless, those subsidiary organizations were not wiped out, and there was still a measure of independent advocacy that emerged between 2004 and this past year. So, while CIJA put all its efforts into a "behind the scenes" policy and took a risk-averse approach to open, up-front communications (as expressed by its policy document called "The Ten Commandments"), the Jewish community had some choice about that approach through still-active alternatives.

As to the behind-the-scenes approach, or what might be called a sha-shtil method, the Jews of Canada should take a lesson from the past when, to their dismay during the time of the Holocaust, such hidden advocacy practices turned out in reality to be no advocacy at all.

In effect, CIJA 1.0 had a mini-monopoly. But CIJA 2.0 has a complete monopoly. All that is left now is the one and only centralized agency for Israel and Jewish advocacy. It's a serious worry that if that one body follows the lead of its predecessor and pretty well only pursues behind-the-scenes advocacy, the effect on the cause of Israel and Jewish support will be devastating. Effective Israel advocacy must be seen and heard, and must be timely.

For example, CIJA 1.0 was in authority during the introduction of "Israel Apartheid Week" at the University of Toronto, which has now spread to 40 universities in Canada and the United States. There was no battlefront opened by CIJA's leadership against this deceitful and vicious attack on Israel, and to the best of my recollection, which I've since confirmed with activist students from the organization Hasbara, those student organizations under CIJA's umbrella were cautioned to ignore anti-Israel tirades. They were told that behind-the-scenes measures would handle matters. As we know, whatever tactics were in fact undertaken, they turned out to be useless.

All we can now do now, in light of Canadian Jewry's current factual reality, is to warily watch events as they proceed, and hope that all goes well. But if we see that Israel and the Jewish people are not being defended properly by our Canadian advocacy institution, we must let our voices be heard, loud and clear.

Israel's new normalcy

Over the last number of months, Israel has been feeling like a normal country. Citizens have boycotted cottage cheese, doctors have been striking for a restructuring of their salaries and now tent cities are sprouting up all over Israel in protest of the lack of affordable housing. All this while a few Qassam rockets have fallen, and there remains the "minor issue" of September and the United Nations vote on Palestinian statehood. It has even been reported that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is debating a policy of publicly pursuing a nuclear weapon.

What is remarkable is that in the midst of these "minor" existential challenges, Israelis have found the room not only to worry about the question of whether we will be, but who we want to be, and what kind of a society we want to have. These last few months are the greatest sign of Israel's power and success. While our neighbourhood has not miraculously relocated to North America or western Europe and is still a profoundly dangerous place, Israelis are beginning to move beyond a singular preoccupation with the crisis of survival. These are the harbingers of a new normalcy.

Jewish sovereignty is not expressed merely in national independence for the Jewish people, but in the opportunity for the Jewish people to shape our own society in accordance with the values and ideals of our people and traditions. It is about creating a society of value, grounded on a politics of values. It is about moral aspirations meeting the public marketplace and inspiring the creation of a new reality.

Rabbi Donniel Hartman

The Israeli government can look at the various civic protests over the last few months as localized challenges that need ad hoc political solutions. It might even lead to the "solving of the problem" through the firing of the finance minister, or the minister in charge of cottage cheese. Once we know whom to blame, we can continue along our merry way. Or we can ask ourselves what are the moral challenges being raised and how do we systemically respond.

Much of Israel's economic and military success over the last decade has resulted from the decentralization of our economic structure and the allowing of a less regulated and freer economic system steered by market forces. In one sense, everyone has gained as the standard of living has risen dramatically. At the same time, however, it has created a new poor, a poor that in dollar-and-cents terms is not worse off than before, but that in psychological terms finds itself at best unable to meet and maintain the new standard of needs to which our society has become accustomed.

The prosperity of Israel both necessitates and affords us the luxury of asking anew questions of the individual's rights and needs and the role of society therein. One of the important lessons of our tradition is that one needs to take into account both objective and subjective needs. As we learn in the Talmud, objective needs include food, shelter, clothing, and the ability to have and sustain a family. The objective needs also include the right to dignity. Needs and dignity, however, also are subjective, and it's incumbent upon a society to make room for this subjectivity in its aspiration to set a just distribution of its resources.

The obligation of sovereignty and the dividend of prosperity require us not only to ensure that we meet peoples' basic needs, but also ask ourselves both what a person needs in order to live a life of dignity and what we must do as a society in order to ensure that this dignity is the inheritance of all. As we race forward, we must ensure that we not only refrain from leaving people behind, but ensure that the values of care, compassion and consideration we exhibit toward each other on the battlefield define our marketplace as well.

The recent internal events in Israel are an indication that some of these values are missing and that a larger conversation of this type is long overdue. For many years, the rejoinder was, "We'll deal with these questions tomorrow, for today we have more pressing concerns." In the history of Israel, it's time to officially recognize that tomorrow has come, and whether we will be an aspirational and values nation is both the challenge and opportunity of the day.

Israeli protests and politics

No, the summer protests in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and other Israeli cities have nothing in common with the violent power struggles in Cairo or Damascus. The Israeli demonstrations have a light summer air to them, with top entertainers taking centre stage. In contrast, Egypt's "Arab spring" has turned into a power struggle between the military regime and the Muslim Brotherhood, while in Syria, the regime is slaughtering its citizens in a desperate effort to stay in power. In Israel, the protests celebrate the democratic process, and are not an attempt to create one.

But the Israeli demonstrations reflect some real grievances, particularly the growing gaps between the top and bottom of the economic pyramid. Although Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and other top officials have acted wisely to avoid the devastating unemployment prevalent in Europe and the United States, many students get exploitation wages and cannot find basic accommodations. In addition, Israel's small market is dominated by politically connected monopolies and cartels that overcharge for basic goods and services.

The media has also embraced the protests, which provide cheap content, like the reality shows that dominate Israeli programming. Newspapers and journalists who have tried to unseat Netanyahu and his government from the beginning have played up the anti-government signs and slogans among the demonstrators. In parallel, some editorial –writers thrilled at what they referred to as a "crisis atmosphere" and "panic" – gleefully predict Netanyahu's imminent downfall.

But there is little chance of a revolution. As is often the case, the protesters know what they are against, but converting slogans like "the people want social justice" into viable public policy is far more difficult.

Many of the energetic leaders interviewed on TV and radio come across as vain publicity seekers, good at using Facebook and Twitter, but with no understanding of economics and public policy. The biblical injunction to care for the needy, insistently demanded by the Prophets, remains a distant goal, as different constituencies have different and even opposing priorities.

In theory, social protests benefit the left, but the Israeli political reality is more complicated. For many decades, the labour/left, in various forms, was the dominant power, and was responsible for socialist policies that choked economic development and empowered a privileged and often corrupt elite.

During a brief return to power in the early 1990s, the left led the messianic peace efforts, but the collapse of Oslo furthered damaged its image among many Israelis. The leaders of the secretive New Israel Fund use social issues as a cover to promote the return to these agendas, and to gain the trust of major sectors of the Israeli public, major changes are necessary.

Gerald Steinberg

in Jerusalem

The official opposition, led by Tzipi Livni and her Kadima party, is divided and has failed to provide the coherent and realistic alternative policy needed to turn the protests into a political comeback. The remnants of the Labor Party have a few potential leaders with serious social policies and track records, but they remain weakened by the past failures. Labor is also hurt by its association with the Histadrut, the national labour union, whose leaders use the language of social justice while protecting the worst monopolies – particularly the electric company and the dock workers – that have added to the income gap and high cost of living.

In the absence of credible alternatives, the Netanyahu government isn't seriously threatened by these demonstrations and the summer of social protests. But this is a serious wake-up call, and unless the low wages, student housing, monopolies, and inflated costs are addressed in a serious and sustained manner, Israel's vibrant democracy will eventually force a change.

For the first time in many decades, Israelis are able to devote at least some of their time and resources to focusing on social issues, while the neighbouring Arab dictatorships and their armies are crumbling. If this external situation continues, (and the Palestinian UN gambit in September doesn't trigger another terror campaign), many Israelis in the next general election will cast their votes on the basis of economic policies.

Jockeying for influence in the Middle East

The United States has played a major role in the Middle East since World War II and particularly since the Six Day War. American interests in that strategic region – which contains vast oil and gas deposits and sits astride important land and sea routes – grew after U.S. combat troops arrived in North Africa and Iran and the Cold War intensified. Once the United States' relationship with the Soviet Union shifted from that of wartime ally to postwar adversary, Washington began to regard the Middle East as strategically vital due to its close proximity to Russia's southern flank.

From that point onward, the United States looked upon the Mideast as an essential geographic component of its containment policy toward the Soviet Union. Successive U.S. presidents sought to contain Moscow through the 1947 Truman Doctrine, which designated the Mideast as an area crucial to American security interests, and the 1957 Eisenhower Doctrine, which proclaimed support for Middle Eastern governments threatened by communism.

To American historian Rashid Khalidi, the conflicts roiling the Mideast today were largely shaped by the superpower manoeuvring that occurred during the Cold War. He sets out his case in Sowing Crisis: The Cold War and American Dominance in the Middle East (Beacon Press), which is both dispassionate and polemical.

Khalidi, director of Columbia University's Middle East Institute, points out that the Mideast was the focus of some of the most decisive battles of World War II following Germany's campaign in North Africa, its conquest of the Balkans and Crete, its covert operations in Syria, Egypt, Iraq and Iran and its attempt to woo neutral Turkey.

He reminds us that the United States and Britain launched invasions of Sicily, Italy and southern France from Mideast bases and supplied massive quantities of arms to the Soviet Union through Iran, which was occupied by British, Soviet and American soldiers and which was then the largest oil producer in the Middle East.

The war, he observes, underscored the growing importance of oil in warfare and national economies. Had Germany captured the rich oil fields and refineries of Baku and the Mideast, the course of the war may well have been different.

By 1945, he adds, oil production in Saudi Arabia was already a factor in the war effort, thanks to a 1930s agreement that granted an American consortium of companies a concession to drill for oil. As the war wound down, U.S. President Franklin D. Roosevelt met with the Saudi king, Ibn Saud, in Egypt. The alliance they formed proved enduring.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

During the immediate postwar period, the Palestine issue surfaced as an irritant in Washington's relations with the Saudis and other Arab countries. But Arab states grudgingly learned to accept the U.S. relationship with Israel as "the price for doing business" with the United States, he says.

As the Cold War deepened in the 1960s, the United States drew closer to absolute monarchies in Saudi Arabia, the Arab Gulf states and Iran and to authoritarian governments in Jordan, Morocco and Tunisia. The Soviet Union, its arch rival in the race for supremacy, backed "progressive" Arab nationalist regimes in Egypt, Syria and Iraq.

Saudi Arabia's use of Islam as an ideological tool was useful to the United States. "It may seem hard to believe today, given the current demonization of radical, militant political Islam in American public discourse, but for decades the United States was in fact a major patron… of earlier incarnations of these extreme trends," Khalidi writes.

The struggle for influence in the Mideast seesawed back and forth, but the United States ultimately prevailed as Egypt under Anwar Sadat and Iraq under Saddam Hussein defected from the Soviet side.

Starting in the 1960s, the United States became Israel's primary backer, while the Soviet Union rallied behind a constellation of Arab states. But in the earlier phase of the Arab-Israeli conflict, Washington and Moscow voted for the Palestine partition plan and surreptitiously armed Israel. Moscow's support for Israel, its anti-Zionist position notwithstanding, was predicated on a desire to undermine British influence in the Mideast and driven by the mistaken belief that the Jewish state might align itself with the Soviet Union. But with the outbreak of war in the Korean peninsula, Israel and the Soviet Union drifted apart, Khalidi notes.

With Israel's victory in the Six Day War, the United States upgraded its ties with Israel, becoming its chief weapons supplier and political advocate. "The United States had come to see Israel as its most valuable ally in the Middle East in the global struggle with the [Soviet Union] and its proxies," writes Khalidi, a Palestinian American scholar.

Moscow, in turn, wrote off most of Egypt's and Syria's debts for military equipment that had been destroyed or captured by Israel and sold these frontline Arab nations the latest weapon systems, notably surface-to-air missiles, in its arsenal. The two superpowers were drawn still deeper into the Arab-Israeli dispute during the successive War of Attrition and the Yom Kippur War. Khalidi argues that friction between the United States and the Soviet Union at the United Nations was relatively limited at the outset of the Cold War. Indeed, both sides opposed the Anglo-French-Israeli attack on Egypt in 1956. In the wake of the Six Day War, however, tensions flared regularly as Washington bypassed the UN in attempting to bring a measure of calm to the Mideast.

In shuttle diplomacy after the 1973 Yom Kippur War, Henry Kissinger, right, the U.S. secretary of state, arrives in Israel. Israel's foreign minister, Abba Eban, walks next to Kissinger. [IPPA photo]

He cites three unilateral U.S. initiatives – the 1969 Rogers plan that ended the War of Attrition, U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's shuttle diplomacy in the aftermath of the 1973 war, and the 1978 Camp David Accords. "The primary objective of these efforts," Khalidi observes, "was to achieve exclusive influence for the United States and to freeze the Soviet Union out of peacemaking…"

Khalidi points out that U.S. unilateralism manifested itself during the last phase of the Cold War. In 1990, the United States assembled an international coalition to force Iraq out of Kuwait. Thirteen years later, the United States and its allies invaded Iraq.

Khalidi falsely claims that the second Bush administration did not engage in "serious negotiations" to resolve Israel's conflict with the Palestinians. Although George W. Bush tarried, he did lend his support to the 2003 road map peace plan and was the first president to publicly recognize a two-state solution.

He claims that the Oslo peace process, far from being a positive achievement, exacerbated Arab-Israeli tensions. Khalidi's assessment is not supported by the facts. More accurately, the Israeli government's short-sighted settlement policy, Benjamin Netanyahu's lukewarm approach to Oslo, Hamas terrorism and the Palestinians' rush into the bloody second intifadah were the factors that led to Oslo's demise.

Khalidi's skepticism about the United States' post 9-11 campaign to decimate terrorist networks is also misleading. He describes the war on terror as a war against "a largely imaginary set of enemies." But this is a simplistic appraisal, and is hardly in keeping with the erudite and sober tone of Khalidi's otherwise thoughtful and measured book.

Beth Emeth opens supplementary school

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Leslie Lipson

Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue is opening a new Sunday morning supplementary school this fall, the BEBY Aleph Bais Yehuda Elementary School.

Rabbi Leslie Lipson, who joined Beth Emeth two years ago as associate rabbi, said that "the shul leadership has come to the point where they understand that the future viability of the shul rests on education – whether of adults, young families, teenagers or children."

The school will also have a program for children with special needs such as attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) and Asperger's. "Our shul has a long history of special needs programming and education, going back to Rabbi Kelman spearheading Reena," Rabbi Lipson said, referring to the shul's founding rabbi, Rabbi Joseph Kelman, who died in 2009.

Both mainstream and special classes will have a half hour of music together as part of the program.

As of last week, the shul was in discussion about renting a location north of Steeles, in order to have two Sundays a month at Beth Emeth and two in a northern location, Rabbi Lipson said.

Beth Emeth also offers biweekly Friday night davening in Thornhill. An estimated half the membership lives north of Steeles.

Rabbi Lipson – who has a master's degree in education and served as dean of Jewish studies at a San Diego day school – said that there are "enough young families who are not in the day school, who have gravitated towards shuls that have strong educational programs."

The synagogue has been without a congregational school since 2005. At that time, United Congregational Schools, which was formed in 1974 as a joint effort of Beth Emeth and Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, was closed because of declining enrolment. At its height, UCS had classes at both shuls as well as three Thornhill sites, with more than 700 students in total.

Beth Emeth board member and school committee chair Steven Greenwood told The CJN that, starting about two years ago, the shul ran focus groups that indicated a need for supplementary education for members who didn't send their children to Jewish day school.

Greenwood said that a school plays an important role in offering a sense of community and retaining membership of younger families.

The new school will open with junior kindergarten, senior kindergarten and Grade 1 classes, and the shul is also putting together a high school program one evening a week for students who don't attend day school. Rabbi Lipson will study text with the older students.

Less than half the congregants at Beth Emeth send their children to day school, Rabbi Lipson believes.

Tuition is $700 and will be the same for members and non-members."

The curriculum is "a values-based program based on traditional Judaism… extremely warm, caring environment," the rabbi said.

Greenwood added, "Our theme is traditional Judaism… Our focus is on an appreciation of Judaism."

Congress era over as CIJA reboot starts

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress will not be the name of Canada's new, consolidated advocacy organization.

The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), the former umbrella organization that controlled Congress and a number of other advocacy agencies, has chosen a new name.

Shimon Fogel

It's goodbye CIJA and hello… CIJA, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

The organization's branding committee approved the name change last week after a recommendation by a branding firm it hired to help it find a new moniker, according to CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel.

Congress, which was founded in 1919, is for all intents and purposes dead.

Or is it?

Adopting the Congress name had been considered ever since CIJA – formerly the umbrella organization of the now-defunct CJC, Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), University Outreach Committee (UOC), National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) and Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) – embarked on a year-long process of absorbing the functions of its former advocacy subdivisions to become Canada's consolidated Jewish community voice.

The news of CIJA's renaming saddened members of Congress' remaining lay leadership, many of whom now feel that their once-vital, 92-year-old organization has been completely obliterated.

But Frank Bialystok, Congress' Ontario region chair, defiantly claimed that his organization is still alive, although on life-support and in name only.

"The national executive of Congress is still intact. Mark Freiman is still the president… and I am still chair of Ontario region," Bialystok said. "We have no budget so we can't operate. But we own the name. We own the logo. And only we can decide to fold up. Under the terms of our bylaws, only we can determine our replacements. So technically speaking, until there's a regional plenary, I'm still the regional chair. And until there's a national plenary, Mark is still the national president."

In a July 1 message on its website, Congress announced it had halted its activities to make way for CIJA after Congress leadership acknowledged that a unified, replacement advocacy organization needed to be created to represent all Canadian Jewry.

In an e-mail to The CJN, David Schwartz, Congress' Pacific region chair called CIJA's recent re-deployment and dismissal of former Congress employees a "staff massacre."

"Those with vast institutional knowledge regarding advocacy were let go," Schwartz wrote. "I have watched with dismay… this honoured 92-year-old organization… be completely defunded and dismantled."

According to Fogel, CIJA's new staff is now putting the organization's "strategic plan" together for the remainder of 2011 and will communicate it with the public once it's approved by CIJA's board at its next meeting in late September.

Asked what that plan is, Fogel said CIJA's programming will reflect the "entire range of activities" that used to be handled by Congress, CIC, QIC, NCJL and UOC.

"This means outreach to the non-Jewish community, building relations with different groups in Canada, advancing the social justice agenda, safeguarding against hate and antisemitism… and trying to enhance the profile of the Jewish community among non-Jewish groups" in addition to CIJA's Canada-Israel agenda, Fogel said.

He added: "This should offer some reassurance to those who were concerned that one element of the community agenda would suffer at the expense of another."

Fogel said the new CIJA would also adopt a more "animated and robust" position with regard to engaging the Jewish community "so that they feel a sense of empowerment and direct ownership of the advocacy agenda."

He said the new entity's use of the CIJA acronym was purely coincidental, noting that the CIJA board chose the name after haggling over competing branding interests between those who wanted to "remain anchored in legacy names" such as Congress versus those who wanted to "signal an entirely new direction."

"What they all could agree on was [the new CIJA name] because it says what we are and is equally applicable in French and English," Fogel said. "It captures the essence of what our mission is about."

He said there would be a "marketing rollout" shortly for the new brand and a campaign will be launched to establish CIJA as the principal point of contact for "everybody within the community and beyond."

Earlier this month, a self-appointed CIJA nominating committee – led by CIJA chair Steven Cummings and founding member Larry Tanenbaum – established its new board of directors.

Toronto Daily Star covered Holocaust well

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Canadian historian writes a monograph for Yad Vashem Studies

The Toronto Daily Star, Canada's leading mass circulation daily newspaper, generally acquitted itself well in covering the Nazi persecution and genocide of Jews, according to an article published in the latest issue of Yad Vashem Studies, the academic journal of the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority in Jerusalem.

"While the coverage varied in terms of depth, scope, level of detail [and] position of placement of Holocaust-related news items in the paper, the persecution and subsequent annihilation of the Jews in Europe was a recurrent and overall continuous theme that allowed Canadians to understand the true nature of the destruction process," writes author Ulrich Frisse in his monograph, The Toronto Daily Star and Its Coverage of the Persecution of the Jews and the Holocaust in Canada, 1933-1945.

Frisse, a professor of history at the University of Western Ontario, says the Star's commitment to human rights and liberal values was reflected in its "extensive coverage" of this topic.

In an recent interview, Frisse said he decided to research the topic in response to questions from students in his classes on the Holocaust.

"More than one student asked me: What did ordinary Canadians know about [the Holocaust] at the time? Once I started looking into that question, I realized that other than the British and U.S. media, the Canadian media had hardly received any attention from historians at all."

In his monograph, Frisse says the driving force behind the Star's coverage was its correspondent in Berlin, Pierre van Paassen, who was born in the Netherlands in 1895 into a Calvinist family and immigrated to Canada with his parents in 1911.

Frisse says Germany's treatment of German Jews was more than just a story for van Paassen, who was "an exceptional journalist in his passion for the Jewish cause." He elaborated: "Based on his pious upbringing, his personal belief in the Bible as a 'social gospel' and his awareness of Jewish suffering from an early age on, the Nazi persecution of Jews... was an opportunity to live out his strong beliefs through his work as a journalist."

As a result of his aggressive reporting, van Paassen, a Zionist, was arrested by the German government, interrogated, temporarily, interned in the Dachau concentration camp and eventually expelled from Germany.

In justifying his expulsion, the Nazi authorities claimed he was "a Dutch Jew of Lithuanian extraction... an ex-rabbi who engaged in atrocity-mongering while on Reich territory."

The Star, with a circulation of close to 200,000 in 1933 and almost 300,000 by 1945, covered the physical abuse of Jews in Germany with "an almost voyeuristic obsession with the details of torture and human suffering," writes Frisse, whose article is the first on Canada to be published by Yad Vashem Studies.

But the Star's reporting could also be somewhat inconsistent, he adds.

While it lagged behind in its coverage of the 1935 Nuremberg Laws, which banned mixed marriages between Jews and Christians, it was ahead of the curve in covering the nation-wide pogroms of Kristallnacht in 1938.

Frisse, who has written widely on the Canadian German experience in Canada, claims in his article that the Star faltered in its reportage of Nazi genocide after the outbreak of World War II.

Ulrich Frisse

As he puts it, "As the German army advanced deep into [the Soviet Union] throughout the summer and fall of 1941, the Star paid no attention to the extermination activities of the notorious Einsatzgruppen and other murder units that were operating behind the lines of the advancing Wehrmacht."

Apart from focusing on the military aspects of Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union, the Star ran stories on the condition of Jews in German-annexed Austria and Vichy France, where information was more easily attainable.

Like other North American dailies, the Star did not employ a foreign correspondent in German-occupied Europe and relied instead on wire services.

"Lack of first-hand reports about atrocities through their own reporters may be part of the explanation of why the Star was reluctant to print stories about the Einsatzgruppen murders in the East, despite such information being available to the editors," Frisse explains.

As well, the Star questioned the reliability of the Polish underground sources who unearthed this material, he points out.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Elul: a month of contemplation

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein

A group of men struggle hard, and finally they reach the top of a mountain. As they survey the landscape below them, they realize this was not their intended destination. They had climbed the wrong mountain.

Similar things happen to all of us. We often get so caught up in what we're doing and we don't ask ourselves why we're doing it and the purpose of our efforts. And so, the Torah tells us to take time out. Pause. Think about your goals and your mission. Don't worry about your schedule and all the things you have to do. Think about the reason you're doing them.

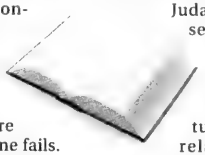
In general, Jewish tradition sets aside time for such an endeavour each night when reciting the Shema before retiring. But for the entire year, there is one month dedicated to this goal, the month of Elul. Like a shopkeeper who takes inventory at the end of the year, during this month, each one of us should review his conduct and goals.

This Shabbat, we are going to bless the new month of Elul, which is known as a month of tshuvah, repentance. The intent is not merely repentance for one's deeds, but, more fundamentally, the examination of one's purpose.

The analogy is often given that if a person is lying on the ground, one might try to lift him up limb by limb, or one might call him by his name and beckon him to stand.

The difference between the two approaches is that one focuses on the body, the other on the soul. When effort is concentrated on the body – i.e., the mitzvot as deeds – every mitzvah must be considered individually. Here one is successful, there one fails. The person's spiritual state is an aggregate of his different activities. There is nothing internal holding him up.

Rabbinic Reflections



The other approach gives the soul expression, and as the soul manifests itself, the person's deeds change. When the change is only external, involving his conduct, the person remains the same inside. He refines his conduct, but not his self. And thus he is faced with a constant struggle. For at any given time, his natural tendencies may lead him away from doing what is right and good.

When, by contrast, the change is internal, the person does what is right not as a struggle against his will, but as an expression of who he is. He has, to borrow our sages' words, made God's will his own will. He carries out God's commandments, because he wants to make an abode for Him here in this world.

Judaism is then not just a set of laws and restrictions that must be observed. It's a comprehensive approach to a person's spiritual development and relationship with God achieved through the fulfilment of Torah and mitzvot. It's to this goal that one should strive in the month of Elul.

May we celebrate this upcoming High Holiday season in Jerusalem in the third Beit Hamikdash with the Mashiach. Shanah Tovah.

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein is spiritual leader of Chabad Chabanel in Montreal.

Judaism today and tomorrow

Are Jews an eternal people? Is Jewish continuity assured? Some members of the community are confident. Others, less certain, recite the litany of a tragic past.

Some 2,700 years ago, 10 tribes of Israel were vanquished and disappeared from the face of history. About two centuries later, the remaining two tribes were enslaved and exiled. Overcoming two Jewish rebellions, the legions of Rome in 70 CE destroyed the Holy Temple in Jerusalem, and 60 years later defeated Bar Kochba and his followers, sending the Jewish People into a 2,000-year Diaspora.

In the Middle Ages, Jews were reviled and expelled from one European country after another. The Holocaust left much of Europe without a Jewish presence. In the western world, there has been widespread assimilation and a tragic decline in religious affiliation and practice. Israel is surrounded by implacable enemies that seek its destruction.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, in his inspiring book Future Tense, Jews, Judaism and Israel in the Twenty-First Century, says that the history of Judaism is a sustained defiance of entropy – the law that states that all systems lose their energy over time.

He writes, "Every tragedy in Jewish history was followed by a new wave of creativity. The destruction of the First Temple led to the renewal of the Torah in the life of the nation, exemplified by the work of Ezra and Nehemiah. The destruction of the Second Temple led to great works of the oral tradition, midrash, Mishnah and the two Talmuds.

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

The medieval encounter with Christianity led to the renewal of Bible commentary. The meeting with Islam inspired a renaissance of Jewish philosophy. The greatest catastrophe of all led to the greatest rebirth: a mere three years after standing eyeball with the angel of death at Auschwitz, Bergen-Belsen and Treblinka, the Jewish people responded by their greatest collective affirmation of life in 2,000 years, with the proclamation of the State of Israel."

Even those whose ties to Judaism are cultural or ethnic are not unaware of Jewish distinctiveness and contribution to world knowledge and betterment.

Milton Himmelfarb has observed, "Each Jew knows how thoroughly ordinary he is; yet taken together, we seem caught up in things great and inexplicable... The number of Jews in the world is smaller than a small statistical error in the Chinese census. Yet we remain bigger than our number. Big things seem to happen around us and to us."

The miracle of Jewish survival lies not in the majesty of numbers, nor in the power of great multitudes. The secret is found in what the Bible terms the consecrated remnant and the dedicated minority.

Once again to the impassioned words of Rabbi Sacks, "I want to say to my children [take the Jewish heritage] cherish it, learn to understand and love it. Carry it, and it will carry you. And may you in turn pass it on to your children. For you are a member of an eternal people, a letter in their scroll. Let their eternity live on in you."

Contrasts in summer protests

The summer of 2011 will be remembered for the political turmoil across the Arab world, the famine in the Horn of Africa, the mass murder in Norway and the economic gyrations in Europe and North America. A retrospective of the past few weeks might also include reference to the protests on the streets of London and Tel Aviv.

But inasmuch as the social unrest in England and Israel captured world headlines at around the same time, the objectives, context, intensity and consequences of the two disturbances were vastly, and viscerally, different.

While the mayhem in London was apparently triggered by "the shooting of a dark-skinned man by police under suspicious circumstances" (Globe and Mail, Aug. 8), the ensuing chain of events had few of the hallmarks of a race riot. On the other hand, the ferocity of the looting and arson far exceeded the random hooliganism that London – like other cities around the world – has experienced, and become accustomed to over many years.

Various explanations for the deviant behaviour of the troublemakers, relating mostly to dysfunctionality in their homes and communities, have provided more than ample grist for a hungry media. Nonetheless, there still is not, and likely cannot be, any truly rational defence for the wanton violence of the perpetrators.

What seems to have emerged above all else is a propensity for lawlessness just for the sake of it, the actions of what's been described as feral youth with an abiding sense of entitlement who were on a rampage to satisfy their cravings for what was not rightfully theirs, and who were railing against a society that they feel has alienated and ignored them.

My View

Lawrence Hart

In Israel, there are segments of society that are experiencing increasing hardship and have also felt compelled to publicly vent their discontent against a status quo that has otherwise turned a blind eye to their legitimate grievances. They, too, have felt ignored.

In pursuit of reasonable salaries and improved working conditions in an administratively rigid and often exploitative socialized health-care system, Israeli doctors have recently expressed their dissatisfaction. But the singular event that has gripped the nation during the dog days of July and August has been the establishment of a tent encampment along Tel Aviv's famed Rothschild Boulevard and street rallies both in Tel Aviv and elsewhere that have attracted hundreds of thousands to draw renewed attention to Israel's housing crisis and spiralling cost of living. What's notable in all of this is that aside from minor skirmishes with police when thoroughfares have needed to be cleared, the protests in Israel have been almost entirely non-violent, and there's been absolutely no intent to damage property. It remains to be seen whether moral suasion through peaceful assembly will have the desired results but, regardless of the outcome, the behaviour of the "Israeli street" speaks to a civility under pressure that is rarely seen elsewhere and stands in stark contrast to the mindless vandalism that has been so evident in Britain.

If conduct in times of dissent is any yardstick, it's clear that Israelis have set an enviable example in the enactment of those fundamental freedoms of speech and assembly that are central to their country's democratic ethos.

Back to school resources, Part 2

Last week I introduced you to sites for Jewish families interested in homeschooling their children. Even if this kind of education isn't for you, you can benefit from some of the great educational sites that homeschoolers find themselves coming back to. As everyone gets ready for another school year, here are some Jewish back-to-school sites.

Mommzy is a "Modern Jewish mom married to a fabulous Jewish dad raising five amazing little blessings... enjoy our adventures in homeschooling and in life!" Her site, Our Jewish Homeschool Blog, has lovely holiday-related activities along with pages you can download and print off. For example, her Good Morning checklist reminds you to say Modeh Ani when you first get up, brush your teeth and make your bed. And the Good Night checklist has similar (colourful) advice for winding up your day. (In order to print off her materials, you'll need a free Google Docs account.) [http://bit.ly/bk2school1]

Chinuch.org is a remarkable resource that allows you to download Jewish lesson plans, worksheets, illustrations and maps. You can download PowerPoint presentations about Israel, clip art, archival excerpts from Olomeinu magazine and much more – all free! Anyone can browse the site, but you will have to register in order to download material. Members are encouraged to contribute copyright-free materials to the database. [http://bit.ly/bk2school2]

Jacob Richman has created several wonderful games that will keep kids (and their parents) busy for hours. You can try some challenging Jewish trivia quizzes (Jewish holidays, Israeli geography, entertainers and more.) Richman provides Hebrew song lyrics as well as a Jewish Clipart Database with more than 300 lovely pictures that you can copy and use in school assignments. And he has designed a lovely little program that allows you to type out and print signs in Hebrew even if you don't have Hebrew fonts installed on your computer. [http://bit.ly/bk2school3]

Jewish & Digital

Akhlah: The Jewish Children's Learning Network is a huge site with activities about the Jewish calendar, Israeli geography and Jewish heroes. Its Aleph-Bet section has colouring pages for every letter in the Hebrew alphabet as well as printable flash cards, practice pages and a button to hear how the letter pronounced. [http://bit.ly/bk2school4]

All the resources mentioned so far are free and can be useful no matter how your children are getting their Jewish education. But I came across two interesting sites that provide their services for a fee. If you want to homeschool but need some help, Room 613 offers "comprehensive, affordable, online Judaic studies for all ages and levels in an interactive virtual classroom." Classes range from Morah Elana teaching "Beginning Reading and Writing" to Rabbi Yosef's Resnick's "The Thinking Jewish Teenager's Guide To Life." [http://bit.ly/bk2school6]

Similarly, the Brooklyn-based Jewish Online School offers computer-based live classes and interactive learning no matter where in the world you live. I was interested to note that the testimonials in the promotional video are from Germany, Texas and from the Kozuch Family of Bognor, Ont., who live outside Owen Sound. This virtual school starts (as do most brick-based ones) on Sept. 6. [http://bit.ly/bk2school7]

New Canadians find a home at Camp Kadimah

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Being in your first or second year of summer camp can be daunting for a kid under 10 years old, but imagine trying to fit in at 13, 14 or 15 when your bunkmates have pre-established friends and you're a newcomer both to camp and Canada.

Ask a handful of newcomers to Canada, all Israelis of Russian descent, and they'll admit that their first days at Camp Kadimah were challenging. The camp, in its 67th year hosting Jewish youngsters from the Atlantic region, as well as the rest of Canada and the United States, brings together close to 300 young people for six weeks of secular and Jewish programming.

Peter Svidler, 15, Halifax, heard about Kadimah from other newcomer families who've settled in Halifax in the last two years.

"I thought I'd try it, even though I knew everyone else had their friends and knew each other so well. I was homesick at first, but grew out of it. I've found, as I was told, the best part of Kadimah is community."

Brian Waltman of Toronto, a graduate of the University of Western Ontario and 13-year veteran of Kadimah, was rosh Machar, head of the 13- to 14-year-old group, with 92 campers, including six Canadian newcomers.

"The newcomers, who speak Russian and Hebrew, are totally fluent in English, too, bringing a new perspective to our group. Most of the kids at Kadimah are from Ontario with a similar cultural background, so when you add in the newcomers, I've found they integrate well and certainly learn from each other."

Newcomers to Atlantic Canada enjoyed their time at Camp Kadimah in the Machar (ages 13-14) and CIT programs. From left are Igal Tichonov, Artur Brunets, Meri Liberman, Emil Safronchik and Peter Svidler.

Artur Brunets, 14, of Halifax, a two-year veteran of camp, was the go-between for many of the newbies. "He helped them integrate," said Brian. "When I look at each of these kids now, they're equal contributors to the programming and spirit of our section [which makes up about 40 per cent of the camp]. I see leadership qualities in each of the newcomers as they move to the [counsellor-in-training] program, and eventually, become counsellors."

Artur moved to Machar this year. As camp entered its final days of 2011, he noted that "Machar is much more serious. For example, Tisha b'Av had a strong program about how hard it was for Jews in older times."

There was plenty of time for fun, too. Artur was excited about the one-day, 16-hour field hockey marathon. "It was something we didn't have time to play every day, with all the other programming, but this was a really fun day."

He also welcomed the three-day, two-night canoe and camping trip that took several campers about 100 km from Kadimah. He talked about it constantly, Waltman said.

Meika Lewis of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and a graduate of University of Pennsylvania, was the assistant rosh Machar. She was completing her 13th and probably final, year as a Kadimah camper and staff member.

She said Meri Liberman, 13, of Dartmouth N.S., was a third-year camper who arrived a week late this year because of planned dental work that was cancelled at the last minute.

"The same day she arrived, she was part of a cohesive group," Lewis said. "She became part of Machar Glee singing group that performed at several events and was in the Annie chorus. She also bonded with children from northern Israel who were attending Kadimah for the first time. They were excited that someone could speak with them [in Hebrew] and also teach them English."

In very fluent English, Meri said there was no way she could stay home "and be bored after the dental work was cancelled. I told my mom I had to go [to camp]."

Igal Tichonov, 13, Fredericton, N.B., liked seeing friends from across the country again. A sports buff who plays everything, including minor hockey, at home, Igal said he couldn't wait for the hockey marathon to start.

Emil Safronchik, 15, of Moncton, N.B., was in the counsellor-in-training program and experiencing Kadimah for the first time.

"My English wasn't so good when we came to Moncton, but I've learned quickly," he said. "I knew there were Russian-Israelis here and could speak to them in either language, so I did that, plus I speak English to the Canadians, of course."

He hoped to remain in touch with friends after camp closed down Aug. 14, particularly the young people from Israel. "I'm not sure if we'll meet again."

Asked if he hopes to return as a counsellor, he grins. "I do. I wasn't sure for the first couple of days, but now I am. Being here certainly makes me feel more Jewish. Everyone here is the same."

Clarification

In the article "Ex-mashgiach challenges COR overtime policy" (CJN, Aug. 18), we wish to clarify that there are two appeals currently involving the parties. The appeal related to alleged overtime owed to Morley Rand was launched by the Kashruth Council of Canada. Rand also launched a separate appeal to the Ontario Labour Relations Board in a matter unrelated to overtime.

Canadian teens work at unique camp in Israel

Laura Fixman
Intern

Two Canadian teens went to Camp Koby, a camp in Israel for kids who have lost a parent to terrorism, expecting to improve the lives of others, but instead they said they ended up improving their own.

Sara Gomolin, a 16-year-old Torontonian who attends Ulpanat Orot, said she wanted to be a counsellor at Camp Koby because she wanted to do something during the summer that's meaningful and not selfish. She said she didn't realize what a difference she would make in the lives of her group.

"Seeing at least one child smile because of me and knowing that I made someone happy, that was amazing," she said.

Ari Drazin, a student at the Hebrew Academy of Montreal, heard about the camp from his cousin. He wanted to do something this summer that had a purpose, but he didn't realize how much fun he would have at Camp Koby as well.

"You would think it would be sad putting all those kids who experienced a loss together, but it was the happiest place on earth," he said.

The camp is part of the Koby Mandell Foundation, which was founded by Rabbi Seth and Sherri Mandell and named for their son, who was killed in 2001 at age 13 by terrorists in the West Bank, as was his friend Yosef Ish Ran.

The 10-day program includes activities such as swimming, trips to an amusement park, kayaking, a rope course, touring Israel and regular therapy sessions.

Drazin, 16, was a counsellor for 10- and 11-year-olds, while Gomolin was a counsellor for six- and seven-year-olds.

Ari Drazin and Sara Gomolin at Camp Koby.

Gomolin said that with her group, their young age and the language barrier made it a challenge.

Drazin said that although he didn't get much sleep at camp, since his kids didn't really have a bedtime and there were staff meetings after they did finally fall asleep, it was all worth it.

"The feeling you have helping the kids is so satisfying," Drazin said. "I've gained so much and learned so much myself, and I never thought that would happen."

Gomolin said that although the kids have gone through something that isn't normal, Camp Koby is just a regular, happy place.

She said her kids eventually opened up to her, and that's one of the reasons she would go back if she could and would recommend the experience to anyone.

"It's one of the nicest things you could do, and you learn a lot about yourself," she said. "No matter how hard it gets, it's important to remember why you're doing it. It was very strenuous and hard, but also very rewarding."

Gomolin and Drazin both had experience in Bnei Akiva children's programs before working at Camp Koby, but they had never worked at a sleepover camp.

Drazin said that Camp Koby offered an experience similar to North American camps. Gomolin added that it was just like any other camp, and for her, the best part is knowing that she made an impact.

"I know that my kids had an amazing time at camp," Gomolin said. "They told me that they loved having me as a counsellor."

Drazin said the experience was just as meaningful for him as it was for the kids.

"It was an amazing 10 days just being at camp," he said. "It gave me a much bigger appreciation of my family and friends."

When asked to describe their experience at camp, both Drazin and Gomolin described it as life-changing.

Israelis will suffer from Palestinian independence

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

In September, the Palestinians are expected to attempt a unilateral declaration of independence at the United Nations, using the 1967 borders as a boundary. Such a declaration will have significant political impact on the state of Israel and its citizens abroad.

Sixty-four years ago, the Jewish community of Eretz Yisrael and its political leaders adopted UN Resolution 181 of November 1947, which divided British Palestine and established two states, one Jewish and one Arab.

The Arab refusal to accept Resolution 181 brought about Israel's War of Independence, or the 1948 War as the Arabs term it. By the end of the war in March 1949, a totally new political reality had emerged. The Jewish state was born and the Arab state wasn't. Jordan and Egypt captured some of the territories that were supposed to be a part of the Arab state. Those territories would eventually become the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

After the 1967 Six Day War, Israel found itself in possession of both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Excluding the annexation of east Jerusalem to Israel, the territories occupied in 1967 were never annexed by Israel, and their residents were never given Israeli citizenship.

The political and demographic realities of the last 40 years have brought the Israelis and the Palestinians to an understanding that the solution to the conflict between them will be based on dividing the land. Even though it was not fully stated at the time, the 1993 Oslo accord, in which the majority of the Gaza Strip and the Jericho region of the Jordan Valley were transferred to the Palestinians, targeted the main objectives.

In the 18 years since Oslo, the two sides have known many ups and downs, especially times when Israelis were brutally murdered in terrorist attacks that threw any trust between the sides into the abyss.

The fall of the Gaza Strip to the Hamas terrorist organization, the deteriorating military situation and the constant attacks against innocent Israelis led to 2009's Operation Cast Lead, the campaign in Gaza. All of these increased the distrust between Israelis and Palestinians.

The Palestinian Authority, which rules the West Bank under the leadership of Mahmoud Abbas and Salam Fayyad, has been active for a long time in the political arena. And now it seems they are seeing the "fruits" of their efforts – the achievement of wide international support for the Palestinian claim to an independent state based on the 1967 borders in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Technically, any resolution passed by the UN General Assembly will have no meaning on the ground. However, Israel may find itself in an increasingly uncomfortable political isolation, one that could see Israel turn overnight from an "occupier" to an "invader." Israeli citizens living in settlements across the Green Line (in the West Bank) will be considered as invaders in a foreign country.

At such a time, if the world's nations wished, they could impose economic sanctions and a complete boycott of Israel, which would severely hurt an Israeli economy that relies on exports to Europe and North America and also enjoys foreign investments in the world's stock markets.

Israel could then be described as a state that holds another state (Palestine) by the neck, a state whose population is similar in size to that of Israel. In addition, Israel may be seen by some as a colonial occupier that behaves like South Africa during the apartheid era.

Israelis abroad are highly exposed economically to what has been called the "September effect" – the idea that September is the worst month on the stock market. Those with assets and capital in Israel may suffer financially. And some Israelis have relatives in east Jerusalem and in the West Bank settlements.

International boycotts over the Israeli settlements may motivate the Palestinians to exert physical pressure on those settlements and, as a result, some of the Jewish settlers may look for living alternatives abroad.

The role of Israelis abroad is to defend the policy of the State of Israel and its moral justice by using the following arguments:

- The State of Israel totally disengaged from the Gaza Strip, and as a result, the Palestinians established not a state infrastructure but a terror infrastructure that brought suffering to Israelis and Palestinians.
- Israeli withdrawal from major parts of the West Bank will bring the same scenario and expose the majority of the Israeli population living in the greater Tel Aviv area to terror attacks and rocket attacks.
- The Palestinians have no moral right to declare Jerusalem as their capital. Jerusalem was never the capital of any Arab regime, even when it was under Arab or Muslim rule. The sensitivity of the three major religions to Jerusalem is very high, and its political and religious status is a matter that needs a broad consensus.
- The unilateral Palestinian declaration of independence will not bring the conflict to an end. By declaring their own state, the Palestinians refuse to recognize the existence of the only Jewish state in the world – Israel.

If the parties do not go back to the negotiating table soon, as of September, Israel will face a long political battle for world opinion. This battle will affect the future borders of Israel and will have an impact on its citizens with regard to their security and economic stability. This is a battle we must not lose.

More balance needed in coverage of UN gambit

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

As reported in last week's CJN, the Palestinian Authority announced that Sept. 20 is the date they plan to ask the United Nations Security Council to approve its bid for membership for the state of Palestine. A recommendation from the Security Council to the General Assembly is required for UN membership. But since the United States is opposed to the PA's gambit at the UN, viewing it as a way for the Palestinians to avoid having to negotiate with Israel, it is almost certain to use its veto power as a permanent member of the Security Council.

The Palestinians could then go directly to the General Assembly for a vote on "statehood" recognition. With an automatic majority of countries already on their side, it's a foregone conclusion that they'll win this bid, even if it won't change a thing on the ground in the Middle East. Internationally recognized borders, for instance, can only be determined through negotiations between the two parties, not by the UN. So "Palestine" will remain a state in name only, just as it has been since the Palestinians, then under the PLO, first unilaterally declared statehood in 1988, a move recognized at the time by more than 100 countries at the UN.

This time, however, the Palestinian move could result in an enhancement of their status from "observer" to "non-member state," and with that change comes a greater access to a range of institutions where it could file grievances against Israel, thereby further isolating Israel internationally. Many Israeli analysts believe this is the reason behind the PA's gambit in the first place.

The PA's move also has strong emotive resonance. After all, Israel is a strong (if besieged) independent state and the perennially weak Palestinians are stateless. So immediately, world sympathy "must" be on their side. The fact that Israel officially favours the creation of a Palestinian state and has twice sought to achieve that through mutually agreed-upon negotiations (at Camp David in 2000 and during the Annapolis talks in 2007 – offers of statehood that were rejected both times by the Palestinians) appears to have almost no resonance at all internationally.

Consider, for instance, an Associated Press report about the Palestinian UN bid carried on the Globe and Mail's website on Aug. 14. After laying out PA member Hanan Ashwari's account of the Palestinians' planned approach at the UN next month, and noting that the Americans want a Palestinian state to result from negotiations not unilateral actions, AP stated the following:

"The Palestinians, however, seem to have given up on negotiations with the current hardline Israeli government. Talks have stalled for the past few years, and Palestinians instead want the UN to recognize their future state in the Gaza Strip, West Bank and east Jerusalem — territories Israel captured in the 1967 Mideast war. Israel withdrew settlers and soldiers from Gaza in 2005 but still occupies the West Bank and east Jerusalem."

Although its story was filed from Ramallah, AP didn't bother to include any Israeli comment. It should have done so for essential balance, something that the Globe and Mail online editors might have ensured. In any event, readers were left with the distinct impression that the Palestinians, confronted by Israeli intransigence, have no option left but to appeal to the UN.

Again, while this conclusion conflicts with the historical record about what caused a breakdown in the peace process, it accords with emotive, popular perception about the "underdog" Palestinians.

What's for supper?

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

Does your family complain that you make the same dishes over and over? Here are some dishes to add to your repertoire that I think everyone in the family will like. They're also easy and inexpensive to make.

Purchase five or more pounds of ground beef, especially if it's on sale, and cook, breaking it up, until no longer pink. Freeze the cooked meat in 1-lb. packages to be ready for quick dinners. Then let your imagination rule. Learn to mix and match the ingredients that your family likes to come up with variations that they'll be asking for more of.

QUICK SHEPHERD'S PIE

Your kids will love this. If you like it well seasoned you can add spices of your choice. You can also add any vegetable you like such as green beans, mushrooms or mixed vegetables.

1 lb. ground beef
½ onion, diced
salt and pepper to taste
½ tsp. garlic powder
2 tbsp. flour
1 1/2 cups beef broth or liquid from canned corn
1 can corn
instant mashed potato mix

Brown beef and onion in a large frying pan with salt, pepper and garlic powder. Make sure the meat is broken into small pieces. Drain all the grease from the pan and sprinkle flour over meat mixture. Add broth and stir. Scoop the mixture into the bottom of a 1-1/2-quart casserole dish.

Meanwhile, prepare enough mashed potatoes to serve 6. Spread drained corn over meat mixture in casserole. Spread the mashed potatoes over the corn and meat. Bake at 350 for about 20 minutes.

HONEY LEMON CHICKEN

This recipe also works well with whole cut-up chicken or bone-in chicken breasts.

8 chicken legs, skinned
4 tbsp. honey
4 tsp. grated lemon zest
2 tsp. fresh lemon juice
2 large clove garlic, minced
salt and pepper to taste

Arrange chicken in a baking dish. In a small bowl combine remaining ingredients and spoon over chicken. Bake for 45-55 minutes at 350, until juices run clear when chicken is pierced with a knife. Makes 4 servings.

ימים נוראים בסגנון אחר

לאלה מיכם שקשה להם להפוך ל"כאילו" דתיים לימים הנוראים, אבל רוצים בכל זאת להתנסות בחוויה המיוחדת של תחילת השנה היהודית- אני רוצה לשתף אתכם באופציה שבחרנו לפני כעשר שנים ומאז ממשיכים בה: האחים משה הדן רונן ואביהם מקיימים תפילות ראש שנה ויום כיפור באוניברסיטת יורק. אין הפרדה בין נשים לגברים, התפילות בעברית ובאנגלית. משה רונן מסביר את המנהגים בצורה יפה ונוגעת, ומזמין את כל הקהל להשתתף, לעלות לתורה, ואפילו לתקוע בשופר. זוהי חוויה מאוד שונה ואין בה את טעמי הלוואי שמפריעים לישראלים רבים כל כך בחווית בית הכנסת הטיפוסי. חוויה מרגשת. מאוד מומלץ.

בטור הקודם תמהתי האם אנשי האוהלים שדורשים צדק חברתי אינם מבינים שהממשלה הנוכחית מוציאה בגדה המערבית את המיסים שלהם שהיו אמורים לבנות דירות.
השבוע היטיב לומר את הדברים אורי אבנרי בעיתון הארץ: "המפגינים הצעירים במאהלים מייצגים תקווה חדשה למדינה. אך כדי למנף את הפגנת הרבע מיליון לשלב הבא יש להתמודד עם דילמות קשות.....המאבק נפגם מפני שהמוחים אינם יכולים לגלות מניין יבוא הכסף למילוי הדרישות הצודקות. ידוע שהכסף יכול לבוא רק משלושה מקורות: המתנחלים, החרדים ותקציב הביטחון המנופח. אנשי האוהלים פוחדים להגיד זאת, שמא ידביקו להם תווית של "שמאלנים". זה נכון, אבל בנקודה כלשהי יהיה עליהם לומר דברים מפורשים."

"The Help"

סרט חדש שעלה לאקרנים בימים אלה, הוא מסכת חייהן של משרתות כושיות בבתי הלבנים של ג'קסון מיסיסיפי בשנים האפלות של ההפרדה הגזעית. אישה לבנה צעירה, שנפשה נקעה מן היחס הגזעני והמשפיל מצד הנשים הלבנות במשפחתה- כותבת יומן שמתעד את חוויותיהן הקשות של המשרתות, דרך סיפורן הספציפי של שתי נשים וסיפור שלישי מזעזע של האומנת שגידלה אותה עצמה. את כל אלה היא מוציאה בספר שהפך לרב מכר ועזר למהפכה של שנות השישים.
סרט מרגש שעשוי מצויין, מבוסס על סיפור אמיתי.

Welcome to UWO's Jewish community

Commencing this issue, Jessica Pollock will be reporting monthly as The CJN's campus columnist.

This summer I decided to read The Help by Kathryn Stockett, an acclaimed fictional tale that sets out the racial inequalities of Mississippi in the 1960s. As I went along, I developed a fond connection with the character Skeeter, a passionate writer. The paradox of her desire to reveal her unconventional non-racial beliefs, yet fearing the inevitable isolation that would ensue if they were ever publicized, compels her to anonymously compose a collection of untold stories of African-American maids.

Campus Life

Jessica Pollock

Unlike Skeeter, the role of being your new monthly student columnist will allow me to freely publish my own views and experiences. It's this principle of freedom of expression that inspired me to assume this position. I also feel like I'm doing it for all those ambitious individuals, fictional ones included, who have not yet been offered such an opportunity.

I am an 18-year-old Jewish woman in my second year at the University of Western Ontario (UWO), double majoring in media and global studies. Being the first CJN student columnist from UWO, I hope to bring a unique perspective to this column regarding events and personalities in the charming city of London, Ont.

UWO is typically the first choice post-secondary institution of the Toronto Jewish teenager. But what makes the southwestern Ontario city of London so attractive that it has grown to be the largest Jewish comfort zone of all Ontario universities? My response is that it is an ideal distance of two hours away from Toronto – relatively close, yet far enough for students to embrace their long-anticipated independence.

UWO has the second-largest Jewish undergraduate population in Ontario, after York University. Ten per cent of UWO's total student body of approximately 30,000 is Jewish, and the Jewish community on campus is centralized, recognized and highly visible.

Jewish Western is the umbrella organization that facilitates two campus clubs, Hillel and Israel on Campus (IOC). A council of elected students who organize numerous social, charitable and Judaic events throughout the year operates Hillel, which us run out of the warm Hillel House near campus. IOC is an Israel advocacy club that promotes Israel education and heritage by working endlessly to counter the negative stigmas of Israel that countless misinformed students regard as legitimate. Both clubs are dedicated to invigorating the Jewish community in London and bringing this community together in both the social and educative spheres.

The majority of London's Jewish student population is located in two main areas. First-year students mostly reside in the Elgin Hall or Alumni House residences, while upper-year students often choose to live in the downtown core. I'm not certain why that is. However, students are wed to these traditions and as a result, these neighbourhoods have maintained their reputation as the heart of Jewish Western.

London is truly home to a proud and budding Jewish community. Although compact, Jewish London thrives in its spirit, closeness and determination to succeed both collectively and as individuals. I am privileged and honoured to begin writing this column as a forum of personal expression, and I'm looking forward to sharing this impending journey with all of you over the course of the year.

With the second-largest Jewish undergraduate population in Ontario, University of Western Ontario enjoys a very organized Jewish campus community. Last year, Hillel at Western organized a successful barbecue for the Jewish freshmen.

French game show puts Jerusalem in 'Palestine'

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Société Radio-Canada ombudsman's office says that complaints it has received about a reference to Jerusalem on a game show as a city in "Palestine" are outside the office's jurisdiction.

The ombusdman's office has referred the matter to the public broadcaster's French audience relations department, which had not responded by the end of last week to queries on the matter by HonestReporting Canada (HRC), a pro-Israel media watchdog.

The reference to Jerusalem occurred on the Aug. 12 episode of Connivence, a half-hour daytime game show that airs Monday to Friday.

Laure Simonet from the ombudsman's office told The CJN in an e-mail that "Radio-Canada's office of the ombudsman was set up to help ensure that the corporation's policies and standards of journalism be fully observed in Radio-Canada news and current affairs programming.

"Entertainment programming, like the game show Connivence, is generally beyond the mandate and jurisdiction of this office."

Radio-Canada is the French-language arm of the CBC.

"We are hopeful that Radio-Canada will take this matter seriously and that they will endeavour to set the record straight on this serious journalistic transgression," Mike Fegelman, executive director of HRC, told The CJN.

HRC sent out an alert on the error and mobilized its members across the country to demand a correction from Radio-Canada. Fegelman said close to 250 e-mails sent out by its members were copied to HRC by late last week, and probably many more went to the broadcaster directly.

A clip of the show where the Jerusalem reference is made is posted on HRC's website.

Host Sébastien Benoit asked contestants: "What city in Palestine is known to be a place of pilgrimage for Christians, Jews and Muslims?"

The contestant answered "Jerusalem," to which Benoit replied: "It is indeed Jerusalem."

Connivence, which has been on the air since April, is produced by the outside company Bubbles Television, which, according to its website, makes more than 25 shows for various French-language television networks. Two teams of two players each compete by answering general knowledge questions for cash prizes of up to $3,000

"As to a correction, it remains to be seen," Fegelman said, "but we are monitoring the program vigilantly and we will know if they air a corrective.

"At present, I can say that we received an overwhelming response from our members in both English and French and from coast to coast, who were quite outraged that their public broadcaster had declared all of Jerusalem to be a city of 'Palestine.'"

Not only is Jerusalem "currently in, and an inseparable part of, the State of Israel," Fegelman told the network, but the implication was that a sovereign state of Palestine exists.

This is not only a matter of a factual error, but the question amounted to "a charged political statement," he said.

Law could help stop store boycotts: ex-MP

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Former member of Parliament David Kilgour, now active in international human rights issues, has joined the counter-protest against the boycott campaign targeting St. Denis Street stores that sell Israeli goods.

On Aug. 13 outside the Naot shoe retailer, Kilgour addressed a crowd supportive of its owners, calling for the immediate end of the picketing. A lawyer by profession, he believes a muncipal bylaw, or other legislation, could be enacted against the continuous demonstrations.

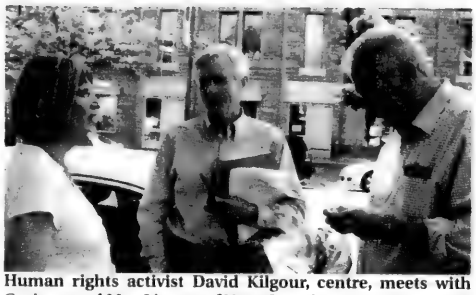
Kilgour was expected to return this past Saturday.

An anti-Israel group Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU) began holding almost weekly demonstrations outside Boutique Le Marcheur last October because it stocks a line of Israeli-made shoes, a small part of its inventory.

In February, the campaign extended to across the street to Chaussures Naot, which sells footwear made at Kibbutz Neot Mordechai in the Upper Galilee, and that store has now become the main target of PAJU. Naot also stocks shoes from other countries.

Kilgour noted that Naot employs about 200 Palestinians as independent contractors in Israel.

"The five or so boycotters here today from PAJU, led by William Sloan… are holding up two large signs about Palestine," Kilgour said. "In reality, they are harming much-needed Palestinian livelihoods with their ongoing Saturday disruptions of commerce in this fascinating neighbourhood of Montreal."



Human rights activist David Kilgour, centre, meets with Corinne and Max Lissoos of Naot Canada.

The anti-boycott protesters, who well outnumbered their opponents and some of whom are not Jewish, are a grassroots group, said one of their leaders, Sharon Freedman, who invited Kilgour to lend his support.

Kilgour lauded Israel for the strength of its democracy and noted that there are Arab members of Knesset and the judiciary. "No serious person can believe that the tactics of PAJU will alter the policies of the government of Israel," he said.

Kilgour represented an Edmonton, Alta., riding from 1979 to 2006, first as a Progressive Conservative, then a Liberal and finally independent. Now based in Ottawa, he promotes democracy around the world, including serving as co-chair of the Canadian Friends of a Democratic Iran and defending the Falun Gong in China.

Kilgour deplored that the boycotters appear to want to put two "legitimate tax-paying businesses out of business and their employees out of work" in Montreal, and said the boycott is contrary to the Canada-Israel free trade agreement.

He also hinted at darker motivations.

"Can anyone today not know that in virtually every country Hitler and the Nazis invaded, one of the first things they did was to seize all Jewish businesses and send their owners to ghettos first and then to death camps?" he said.

Corinne Lissoos, president of Naot Canada, and her husband Max Lissoos, vice-president, came in from Toronto to meet Kilgour and their other supporters. While the Lissooses are Jewish, Le Marcheur's owner, Yves Archambault, is not. Both business owners have refused to comply with the boycott demand. Archambault was on holiday Aug. 13.

Kilgour thinks the city of Montreal and the Quebec government, and even Ottawa, could do more to put an end to the demonstrations in businesses.

Jewish groups cheered in gay pride parade

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Unlike the previous two years, an anti-Israel group did not participate in Montreal's annual gay pride parade on Aug. 14.

Queers Come Out Against Israeli Apartheid (QCOAIA) had been expected to possibly march again, and a Jewish gay group Ga'ava, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and the Israeli consulate were prepared.

As it has for the past four years, Ga'ava (meaning pride in Hebrew) had a contingent in the parade. This year, CIJA (which has assumed much of the functions of the now-defunct Quebec Jewish Congress) lent its support to the Jewish community presence, and, for the first time, the State of Israel participated in the weekend festivities.

"They [QCOAIA] have always been pretty marginal and have become even more so," said Jonathan Kalles, CIJA's associate director of government relations, who attended. "The mainstream LGBT community has no patience for them."

QCOAIA is a separate group from Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, whose participation in Toronto's gay parade has provoked controversy.

About 40 people were aboard or walked with the float fielded Ga'ava, which encompasses lesbian, gay, bisexual and trans-gendered Jews, in the parade along René Lévesque Boulevard.

"There were people of all ages, straight and gay, some non-Jewish," said Ga'ava chair Carlos A. Godoy. "Rabbi [Ron] Aigen [of the Reconstructionist Synagogue] walked the first half of the parade, and Rabbi [Julia] Appel [outreach rabbi at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom] met us at the end. We tried to show the strength of intergenerational relationships and the togetherness of the Jewish community.

"We were extremely well received, cheered and applauded. People came out of the crowd to shake our hand, they thanked us."

The organization also had a booth the previous day at the Community Day in the Gay Village. The theme of their display was Tel Aviv's vibrant gay scene, and it recreated the city's Hilton beach, complete with two tons of sand, a 10-by-10-foot backdrop and attractive models.

The group handed out information on rights and freedoms enjoyed by Israel's minorities and about 1,000 pairs of free sunglasses from the Size Doesn't Matter campaign, launched by the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students to promote a more positive image of Israel.

In co-operation with the consulate and the organizers, Ga'ava also brought in DJ Erez Ben Ishay to play the music following the parade at a dance party at Emilie Gamelin Park.

"Erez Ben Ishay, otherwise known as DJ Erez Bi, is one of Israel's most acclaimed DJs and a regular in the Tel Aviv gay party scene," said the consulate's cultural attaché, Margaux Chetrit.

"I am very happy to be invited for the first time to Canada to spin at Montreal's gay pride festival," he said. "Tel Aviv is where I started my career as a DJ, and I am happy to represent my beautiful city for the enjoyment of everyone."

Chetrit said the consulate was proud to participate in this year's edition of the parade, which under its current organization, has been held since 2007.

"He was a highlight of the evening, and was on for three hours," Kalles said. "The crowd, which must have been about 20,000, was very excited, very enthusiastic about him. Many knew him already, and when he was introduced as coming directly from Tel Aviv, Israel, there was a huge cheer," Kalles said.

The Ga'ava float, a decorated pickup truck, featured the Magen David banner in the rainbow colours symbolizing LGBT community, instead of blue. Similar T-shirts were designed especially for the event.

"The best way to counter [QCOAIA's] negative and divisive message is with a strong, unified presence of like-minded Jews," said Ga'ava in its publicity for the event. But the organization's participation pre-dates that of the other group.

Unlike in the past two years, when Quebec Jewish Congress was an identifiable component in the Ga'ava contingent, CIJA was not visible as an organization, Kalles said. Neither Ga'ava nor CIJA protested the possible presence of QCOAIA, and its non-participation was the group's own choice, Kalles said. "No one tried to exclude them. We never said they should not be allowed to march. Trying to stop them would only give them the attention they seek."

Son born while rabbi was in hospital

In September, while Rabbi Simes was still in intensive care at the Ottawa Hospital, baby Charlie was born. His brit was a cause for celebration for a family that sorely needed something to celebrate. It was held at the hospital, and Rabbi Simes was able to hold the baby in his lap.

After many months at the rehab centre, and to the astonishment of almost everyone, Rabbi Simes had made enough progress to return home – with no ventilator or feeding tube. He has made more progress than anyone anticipated and hopes there is more to come.

"I really think that the people in this community are all sharing this journey, because sickness is a very lonely thing, but it has been amazing. It's not so lonely when I know so many people are impacted," Rabbi Simes in an interview with The CJN at his home.

"When I was still in ICU in Syracuse, when things were very touch and go, people in Ottawa and around the world took upon themselves to do mitzvot. That is incredibly encouraging and inspiring to me. I think of myself as a facilitator of people becoming better people. I just see a lot of good. Of course, it is a silver lining in a lot of darkness, but I focus on the silver lining."

Although confined to a wheelchair and reliant on others to take care of all of his basic needs, Rabbi Simes is able to see the silver lining every day.

Rabbi Simes at the NCSY event celebrating five years of Torah High, where he was a guest speaker.

"Of course Shaindel is everything for me. At this point, I need 24/7 care. She knows what I need. It is a very big challenge for her."

Their children also help with daily care. The older ones have learned to help with the bag that helps expand their father's lungs and also to lift him into the sling lift to move him from his wheelchair. The younger children help to feed him.

"I have done so much more than what was expected," he said. "I didn't know how serious things were until months after the accident. My family was always smiling and upbeat."

"I don't know how people in my situation manage without such support and without faith," Rabbi Simes said.

He is grateful for the support of his family, his community and the professionals who have worked with him over the months. Both his physiotherapist and physician live in his neighbourhood and make house calls, even during the night, if required.

His synagogue is accessible and he's able to spend time there, which is a great comfort. At the time of his interview with The CJN, work was being done on both a new van that is being customized and a new home that's being renovated to accommodate his needs.

In the fall, Rabbi Simes plans to do some volunteer teaching at Hillel Academy, where the students eagerly await him. He will also be working with the teachers at Torah High, an after-school high school program that he helped found five years ago.

Bram Bregman, co-founder of Torah High, said the students are looking forward to having Rabbi Simes back. "The students love him as a teacher. He shows them respect, and they in turn show him respect. I am fairly confident that he will be able to come back and teach. It is what he is really born to do."

Rabbi Simes always considered classroom teaching to be his destiny as well, but since the accident he has had time to think and re-evaluate. "Since then, I have been thinking that my passion and talents have been classroom teaching, but you never know what God wants from you. Maybe now things have shifted. It might seem like I am doing less, but maybe I am fulfilling a different purpose. Maybe God has a different plan for me."

"Of course I have fears, but the only attitude I can take is that if I can make it through today, then I am victorious over that day," he said.

Netanyahu must not escalate the situation

First challenge is to stabilize relations with Egypt

Ari Shavit
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

Reality is cruel. It is cruel for the Americans, who are starting to understand the consequences of toppling longtime Egyptian leader Hosni Mubarak this past winter. Reality is also cruel for the Israelis, who started believing that a social framework could replace security in this country.

Analysis

It is cruel for all those who became enamoured with the Tahrir revolution, the ones who now understand that this same revolution has caused the peace between Israel and Egypt to crumble. It is cruel for Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's rivals, who are witnessing how the Popular Resistance Committees in Gaza are effectively crushing the tent protests. It is cruel for Netanyahu himself, who was so proud of a non-existent death count – and lo and behold, there are now dead to count. Reality is cruel for all Israelis, as it reminds us where we live, who surrounds us and what we are up against.

Last Thursday's co-ordinated terror attacks are quite similar to the kidnapping of soldiers in northern Israel in July 2006. In both cases, a clever terror attack took Israel by surprise. In both cases, the terrorists breached internationally recognized borders. In both cases, Israel did not use the intelligence it had gathered. In both cases, Israel's initial retaliation was direct and decisive, although the response to the retaliation was rocket fire that led to civilian deaths.

Thus, the question that Netanyahu now faces is whether or not to continue the campaign in the south, which is similar to Ehud Olmert's 2006 campaign in Lebanon. Is it necessary to escalate and escalate, and embroil Israel in a second Gaza war? In the 48 hours following Thursday's attacks, Netanyahu acted firmly. He even properly handled the crisis with Egypt, although Saturday's attack on Be'er Sheva may yet change everything.

The prime minister's confidants may try to entice him to implement dangerous plans, and Netanyahu may just fall for it. He seeks revenge, and is powerful enough to get it. He believes in the power of deterrence, and is powerful enough to renew it. If he succeeds, it may lead to the release of Gilad Schalit, which would make Netanyahu the hero of the nation.

But Netanyahu must not succumb to such seduction. Hamas was not behind the attacks on Thursday, nor does it seek to increase tensions with Israel. Therefore, a direct attack on Hamas will be perceived as disproportionate and unjustified. Egypt will not be able to stand aside, and this time, it will surely call back its ambassador from Tel Aviv and freeze the peace.

The international community will not show restraint – it will present Israel as a warmonger. And when hundreds of rockets from Gaza hit Sderot, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Be'er Sheva, Rechovot, Rishon Letzion and Tel Aviv, the Iron Dome missile defence system will be deemed ineffectual. Netanyahu will face the same dilemmas that tore Ehud Olmert apart.

Terrorists armed with heavy weapons, guns and explosives launched four attacks in quick succession in southern Israel near the border with Egypt's Sinai Peninsula on Aug. 18, killing eight people and wounding 31 more, officials said. The assailants targeted a passenger bus, a military patrol and a private car. [Israel Sun photo]

Needed now are restraint, good judgment and long-term thinking. The first challenge is to stabilize relations with Egypt and stabilize the Sinai Peninsula, tasks that call for American leadership and creativity. The second challenge is to renew the ceasefire with Hamas, a task that calls for Israeli restraint.

Even if a future confrontation with Gaza is inevitable, Israel must delay it for as long as possible. It cannot act under such sensitive circumstances. If Netanyahu gets into trouble as Olmert did, his fate will be the same as Olmert's. The protests that are happening today in Israel prewar will be nothing compared to the ones that will come postwar.

No apology to Turkey

Israel will hold fast to its decision not to apologize to Turkey for its raid on a Gaza-bound flotilla ship, despite a direct request from the United States, Israeli officials reportedly said. Israeli media are citing unnamed Israeli officials as saying that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in a phone call with U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton turned down an Obama administration request to apologize to Turkey for the deaths of nine Turkish citizens, including one Turkish-American, in a Navy commando raid on the Mavi Marmara in May 2010. The findings of a United Nations inquiry into the incident were expected to be made public this week. The Palmer report, whose publication was delayed by several weeks in order to give Turkey and Israel more time to reconcile, is reported – according to advance copies given to the two countries – to vindicate Israel for blockading the Gaza Strip. Turkey says it won't reconcile with Israel until Israel offers a formal apology and compensates the victims' families. Israel has offered its "regret."

Light rail finally opens

A long-awaited light rail system in Jerusalem opened after years of delay. The train took its inaugural trip Aug. 19, travelling a 14-km route from Mount Herzl in west Jerusalem, passing through east Jerusalem to end in Pisgat Ze'ev. The light rail project was initiated in 1995 by then mayor Ehud Olmert, who promised a light rail within five years, but the project has since been plagued by delays. The discovery of graves along the route forced adjustments after pressure from Orthodox Jews, while the find by archaeologists of ancient bathhouses and a sixth-century monastery caused further delays. Palestinians opposed the train for linking the west and east sides of Jerusalem. The project cost an estimated $1.4 billion.

Israel Briefs

Israel, Hamas implementing Gaza ceasefire

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

Israel and the Hamas-rulers of the Gaza Strip have agreed to a ceasefire after five days of cross-border violence, officials said Monday, after a previously reported truce was not implemented Sunday night.

One official who was involved in mediating talks between Israel and Palestinian factions in Gaza said the groups had "reached an understanding on a truce and that the truce has started."

A Palestinian official said Hamas had agreed to enforce the ceasefire on smaller militant groups that were responsible for most of the rockets fired at Israel in the recent surge in violence.

The understandings were reached via Egyptian mediation, Ghazi Hamad, deputy foreign minister for the Hamas administration in Gaza, said.

The radical Popular Resistance Committees, which often act independently of the other Gaza militias, also announced a temporary halt to its rocket fire.

A Hamas official said Sunday that the Gaza rulers planned to enforce a ceasefire on Sunday evening at 9 p.m., but 12 rockets were fired from Gaza toward Israel by Monday morning.

Israeli diplomatic sources said earlier Monday that Israel has no desire for an escalation on its southern border, and that the Hamas decision to undertake a ceasefire is a unilateral step that Israel is examining.

Meanwhile, President Shimon Peres visited the southern Israeli city of Ashdod on Monday and said that Israel must respond to the rocket attacks from Gaza, but not in an overly violent way.

"The situation in Gaza is not simple and we must examine all options," said Peres. "We were not the ones who opened fire first. Whoever started the escalation must stop it, not us."

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, centre, talks to Israeli soldiers during a visit to the Iron Dome missile defence system deployed in the city of Ashkelon in southern Israel on Sunday. Fighters in the Hamas-ruled Gaza Strip bombarded southern Israel with rockets and mortars Sunday, striking an empty school and sending thousands of Israelis into bomb shelters, as Israel responded with airstrikes and diplomats scrambled to keep a new convulsion of Israeli-Palestinian violence from escalating. [Flash90 photo]

Egypt welcomes probe into police deaths

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

Egypt welcomed a joint investigation with Israel on the killing of five Egyptian security personnel during an Israeli border operation, but said on Sunday the response was insufficient given the gravity of the situation.

"Although the Israeli statement is seemingly positive, it is not on a par with the gravity of the incident and the Egyptians' anger at the Israeli acts," the Egyptian cabinet said in a statement, quoted by the semi-official Al-Ahram newspaper, following a crisis meeting.

Egypt said on Saturday it would recall its ambassador from Israel, insisting the killing of five Egyptian security personnel while Israeli forces were pursuing gunmen across the border was a breach of its 1979 peace treaty.

Egypt's Foreign Ministry later called in the Israeli charge d'affaires, delivered a protest and demanded a joint investigation into the deaths. Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said Israel regretted the deaths, which followed attacks in its border area that killed eight people and sparked the most serious crisis in ties with Egypt since longtime ruler Hosni Mubarak's overthrow in February.

Barak also said he had instructed the Israel Defence Forces to conduct a joint investigation with Egypt.

"The Egyptian government considers the approval to conduct a joint investigation to uncover the circumstances of the incident a fundamental step to prevent the occurrence of such accidents, as Egyptian blood is not cheap and the government will not accept that Egyptian blood gets shed for nothing," Egypt's state news agency MENA said.

The Israeli decision to work with Egypt to investigate the killings is "positive in appearance but does not fit with the weight of the incident and the state of Egyptians' outrage from the Israeli actions," MENA added, quoting a cabinet statement released after a second round of a ministerial crisis meeting headed by Prime Minister Essam Sharaf late Saturday. "And as Egypt confirms it is keen on the peace with Israel, Tel Aviv also will have to share its responsibilities in protecting that peace," MENA said.

Hundreds of Egyptians continue to protest outside the embassy. One protester burned the Israeli flag and replaced it with the Egyptian one, a Reuters witness reported.

Agenda has changed to security issues

But we were quickly reminded that we're part of the old Middle East. We can never get away from the issue of fighting for our lives."

Mizroch, who holds South African and Israeli citizenship, adds that the terror attacks spun Israel back to reality. "We're not like every other place in the world where we can go into the streets and talk about social order. It was a rude awakening. It wasn't one lone gunman or two. This was a mega-attack. This has definitely changed the agenda from economic and social issues back to security issues."

Following the attacks on Route 12, everyone from government ministers to the average citizen voiced concern over the 280-kilometre-long Israel-Egypt border.

Ser, who has done reserve duty along the border, said the ease with which the terrorists crossed the border is distressful. And no one denies that the government will have to treat the Egyptian border differently from now on

"I am concerned about the danger that's growing in Sinai, and about our porous border there. I have seen first-hand how ineffective it is, how anyone can just step over the fence and sprint toward a vulnerable target inside Israel," said Ser, a father of two young boys.

"It's a problem that Israeli governments have ignored for decades. If this doesn't wake up our government now, I don't know what will. But I do know that it will be terrible – and that it will have been entirely avoidable."

Those who know and use the route into Eilat were not taken aback by the attacks there.

"The attacks in Eilat were not surprising," said Glenda Oxman, a resident of Be'er Sheva. "Since [deposed Egyptian president] Hosni Mubarak has been out of power, no one is in charge in Sinai."

"We see dozens of people from Africa cross the border every day, so I think many people were expecting something like this to happen. We don't have an effective border between where we live and the Sinai desert," Eilat resident Tal Lezerovitz said. "When I heard there was a terror attack, I knew it was people from Gaza crossing into Sinai and then into Israel. The people in Eilat want the border to get closed for security reasons. There is a great concern."

For Yocheved Miriam Russo, another Be'er Sheva resident, the assault on Bus 392 into Eilat was heart-rending.

"What really bothered me a lot is I've been on that bus so many times. It's such a happy bus trip, as people are going on vacation. That just broke my heart," Russo said. Russo and Oxman, neither of whom has access to bomb shelters, spoke to The CJN the day 10 rockets exploded in their home city, killing one Israeli and wounding a dozen more.

"I'm shaking but I'm also angry," said Russo, who recently bought a home in Be'er Sheva. "Nothing serious will get done until rockets hit on Tel Aviv. I don't want rockets to hit on Tel Aviv, but it's gone too far. Today was crazy. You don't get through a day like today and not think there's an escalation of violence."

The international media coverage of the latest events has also irked Israelis. "What makes me so angry about the Route 12 attack is they attacked us, we responded and the news is about the damage Israel did," said Russo. "It makes me so furious that we're not making the world understand the impossible circumstances under which we live."

"I think that international media can't surprise me anymore. They have their well-known bias against Israel, and terrorizing our people has always been treated very gently, unlike Israel's defensive actions, which always get the title of 'aggressive actions' against the poor Palestinians. It makes me minimize my exposure to international media," Rosenkrantz said.

In addition to the current wave of terror, which escalated over the weekend when Grad missiles hit Be'er Sheva on Saturday night, killing one person, Israelis are wondering about the effects of intended declaration of a Palestinian state at the United Nations in September.

"Statehood will provide world legitimacy for future terrorist attacks, especially – but not only – in those areas of Jerusalem that the Palestinian Authority has unilaterally decided to include in its state," said Fabian, a business development manager at Israel-America Chamber of Commerce.

And while gearing themselves up psychologically for another round of terror against the country they choose to call home, Israelis hope the social justice movement that has been sweeping the nation in the last few weeks will not be a victim of the rockets, and most intend to stay in the place they call home.

"I'm hoping the newly returned terror will not diminish the social strife, which is no less important than keeping our country safe," Fabian said.

"I don't know many Israelis who would leave because of security issues," Mizroch said. "People leave because they can't afford to live here."

So, why stay?

Mizroch said the "feeling of belonging" keeps him here. "Even though I love Vancouver for so many reasons, and I love South Africa for so many reasons, I don't have the same feeling of community and belonging that I have here."

Fabian said, "I have a U.S. passport and have lived there for many years. While there, I debated on whether I should live in the U.S. or in Israel. Here, I have no doubt."

"Israel is my home, my land and where most of my friends and family live," said Rosenkrantz, who hasn't renewed his Canadian passport. "Terror can get you anywhere, even in Canada, and it didn't even cross my mind to leave Israel."

Canadian promotes customer service in Israel

Tanya Sapty
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

It seems ironic that a visiting Jewish professor from Canada would come to an Israeli business school to discuss the importance of customer service, yet Prof. Jean-Charles Chebat believes that Israeli business culture may not be as pushy as stereotypically believed.

"One of the clichés people have about Israelis is that they are very bright – very rude and pushy, but bright. I'm not sure if it's true," Chebat said with a laugh in an interview with Ha'aretz, adding that "if Israel is not carrying Jewish values then what is it?"

Chebat, who teaches at the HEC Montréal business school, was invited to speak by Tempus-Biz, a new initiative at the School of Business Administration at the College of Management Academic Studies (COMAS) in Rishon Lezion, last month. The initiative was founded and is directed by Prof. Dafna Kariv as a spin-off of the European Union's Tempus project.

COMAS was the first institution in Israel to be granted recognition by the Tempus project, which aims to create links among students, professors and professionals all over the world around entrepreneurship and innovation.

Kariv and Chebat, leading researchers in entrepreneurship and customer service, respectively, have both found that their Jewish roots and connection to Israel have profoundly affected their professional and personal lives.

Chebat believes the Jewish world has been evolving for centuries, contending that although the Jews of today are much unlike their ancestors, they are still cut from the same cloth. Many of today's Jews don't necessarily have all the same customs and traditions as their forefathers, but they continue to uphold the same values, which Chebat hopes will be the case for many centuries to come.

Kariv has even drawn parallels between successful entrepreneurship and the Israeli mindset, citing Israelis' pro-activism, propensity for risk-taking and creativity that have allowed many Israelis to make waves in the business world.

Despite these inherent traits, Kariv claims the environment in Israel is very problematic for budding businesses, forcing Israelis to think outside the box.

"When you are in a very pressed place, and it is a necessity-oriented environment, you do things, and you initiate things, and you create things, and you become more entrepreneurial," Kariv said.

Prof. Jean-Charles Chebat

Chebat added that Jews have not traditionally run big corporations but rather are known to be a "start-up nation." He even went so far as to assert that not only have Jews been forced to start business endeavours from scratch, but over time, the Jewish people have had to rebuild themselves repeatedly, making them a "start-up people."

He added that historically Jews have not acted as civil servants, and were in fact excluded from public service in many countries for centuries. This exclusion has forced Jews to survive in a hostile environment, a factor Chebat believes has pushed Jews to be more competitive than the business next door.

The need to be competitive and to stay afloat in tough times is all the more relevant today, as an international divestment campaign has been targeting Israel in recent years, affecting Jewish academics as well.

Kariv believes anti-Israel sentiments are largely due to Israel's negative image in the media. She said she has been visiting Montreal every summer for the past six years, and every time she hears anything about Israel, it's negative. She added that the media tends to be very one-sided, saying she has never seen anything on TV praising Israeli start-ups during a recession, for example.

This image, both academics contend, could be changed for the better by bringing students (regardless of religion) to Israel, allowing them to be exposed to local entrepreneurial progress.

"Israel is very dynamic, so we will strive to make it happen," said Kariv.

Partners to form insurance company for Israeli Arabs

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israeli Arab and Palestinian businessmen have joined forces to develop an insurance company that will compete in Israel's insurance market and appeal to the Arab population.

Initial estimations suggest the company will need a capital investment of 60 to 90 million shekels ($16.5 to $25 million Cdn), in accordance with the capital requirements of all Israeli insurance firms.

The partnership includes three business groups – one Israeli and two Palestinian. Each will have equal holdings in the insurance firm and have already committed to providing their share of the required capital investment.

The two Palestinian partners are Al Quds Holding and Wataniya Insurance Co. (also known as National Insurance). The Israeli partner is being led by lawyer and accountant Tarek Bashir, who was among the initiators of the enterprise.

At first, the insurance company will focus on car and property insurance and may broaden its scope in the future to areas such as health and life insurance.

According to Israeli insurance companies, the portion of Arabs insured by Israeli companies is similar to the rest of the population, so none of the large companies are particularly exposed to the Arab population. Therefore, if this initiative succeeds, all of Israel's existing major insurance companies will be equally affected. However, smaller insurance companies, which tend to appeal to niche markets, are most likely to feel the blow.

Associates of the insurance company's initiators claimed that language barriers and cultural differences affect the level of service and treatment that Arabs get from Israeli companies. They say a fully Arab company will have more appeal than one that caters to an Arab market, but is under Jewish ownership.

Israeli insurers said they don't see the enterprise as a threat just yet. "I don't think such an initiative will succeed. What determines where customers go is the price, not the people behind the company," said a senior staff member at one of Israel's largest firms.

A staffer at another major Israeli insurer added, "Companies tend to treat the religious [Jewish] and Arabic sectors as communities that require special attention. You can't be too sure that they experience language difficulties – most of them know the Hebrew language exactly like we do. In any case, what matters most to the insurance customer is not the company itself, but rather the insurance agent that works with him or her. There are many Arab and Jewish insurance agents that specialize in the Arabic sector and are very familiar with it."

A look back at the future of publishing

[Reviewed by Norman Ravvin]

Writers, publishers and some readers know that this is another of the book industry's dark periods.

The shift to e-books is taking place faster than most publishers expected, and though the new technology provides a new source of growth, it puts traditional aspects of the publishing and bookselling industries in danger. Readers will continue to disagree about the comfort level of machines like the Amazon Kindle or Indigo's Kobe, and they likely, too, have varied feelings about the value and viability of the print-on-paper book. (The fact that we have to distinguish that familiar object from its competitors points toward a definite, possibly irreversible shift in the taste of many reader.)

Books written today about these shifts often take a partisan stance, and are somehow themselves immersed in the present predicament: they are in the awkward position of arguing for their own survival. Instead, we might turn to Matt Cohen's Typing: A life in 26 keys, (Random House) a memoir now over 10 years old, which provides much of what the contemporary Canadian reader needs, in economic, historical and cultural context, to consider where publishing and reading is headed in the coming years.

Cohen wrote Typing in the final year of his life as he struggled with the lung cancer that would kill him. It is a bitterly funny portrait of the writing life, of the constitution of new Canadian literary institutions in the 1960s and '70s, and of the position of a Jewish writer in these developments. Cohen's book likely gained some of its prophetic power from the fact that its author knew it might be his absolutely last word on the things that mattered most to him.

Typing portrays an earlier dark period in Canadian publishing and writing history, during the 1990s, when, Cohen tells us, "the selling and publishing of books has been transformed. Many of the independent bookstores whose owners and staff literally campaigned for Canadian books, hand-sold them to their initially dubious customers, provided venues for hundreds and thousands of readings, and were the foundation of the market for Canadian-authored books have gone out of business or been bought by the chains. A single chain, Chapters, is now estimated to sell over 50 per cent of all Canadian books." Alongside such developments Cohen points to the disappearance of publishing houses in the 1980s and '90s, and the increase of foreign ownership of Canadian-based publishers.

Alongside these developments, Cohen acknowledges that the "content" of successful Canadian novels had become more "diverse and unpredictable in every way." Canadian fiction, he adds, had become increasingly successful abroad.

Before he watched these changes taking hold, Cohen was an acute observer as the cultural nationalism of the later 1960s led to a flourishing of new publishing houses, some which were managed by an influential generation of young writers – among them Margaret Atwood, Michael Ondaatje and Dennis Lee.

Cohen focuses his most sentimental and nostalgic passages on the creative ferment he witnessed at Toronto's Coach House Press, "a community that had given itself over to the exploration of esthetics and esthetic experience... Oh, the scorn that was heaped on these bedraggled hippies for caring more about art than commerce." Run out of a converted coach house near the University of Toronto, Coach House Press enraged the cultural elite. In this group Cohen includes established publishers, reviewers and editors, all of whom resented seeing their "status-conferring powers" challenged. Among the many ripe anecdotes he has to tell on this front is one of his encounter with Robert Fulford, then the editor of Saturday Night magazine. Though Fulford was considering a Cohen-penned piece on the Coach House Press, he wondered, of Coach House's editor, "Who ever told him he could be a writer?"

This aspect of Typing offers a portrait of a Canadian culture war: the struggle between mainstream institutions and upstart outfits; between Toronto and the faraway "regions"; between an established generation of cultural workers and their rebellious heirs. Provocatively, he takes this portrait one step further, by arguing that many "of those writers now considered to be our greatest – Robertson Davies, Timothy Findley, Margaret Laurence, Margaret Atwood, Alice Munro," wrote "out of a conservative, small-town, restrained, Protestant tradition that found a tremendous echo of self-recognition across the country." As the "offspring of a completely different cultural and religious tradition," Cohen felt himself to be at inevitable odds with the heroes and values of Canadian literary life.

The presentation of these themes in Typing was not well received, and with Cohen dead, writers of stature, including Atwood and Fulford, took the opportunity to tell Cohen he was wrong (often without mentioning that they themselves were players in the cultural scenario Cohen detailed in his memoir). But this discussion was short-lived.

Many of Cohen's key points – his view of Jewishness in Canadian literature, his carefully plotted history of the ups and downs of CanLit – were little attended to. His understanding of the major challenges facing literary culture in the 1980s and '90s is something only publishers and writers might consider today, when the industry looks most in danger. Typing remains fresh, funny and prophetic, a worthy guide for anyone interested in the past and future of Canadian literary life.

Norman Ravvin's recent books include the novel The Joyful Child and the edited collection Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein.

Ottoman train station converted into a shopping centre

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff reporter

TEL AVIV — Tel Aviv's newest major tourist attraction is a refurbished and altogether charming late-19th-century Ottoman Turkish railway station.

Known in Hebrew as HaTachana (The Station), the complex was the terminus of the Jerusalem-to-Jaffa railroad line. One of the first rail lines in the Middle East, it was officially opened on Sept. 26, 1892, when Palestine was an Ottoman domain.

A hub of commerce in a developing economy, the line operated more or less continuously until the 1948 Arab-Israeli war. After the fighting ended, Israel abandoned the Jaffa station and built a new one in Tel Aviv. Ignored and lashed by the elements, the station in Jaffa fell into disrepair as the rerouted Jerusalem-to-Tel Aviv line prospered.

Several years ago, private investors purchased the derelict station and began converting it into a shopping and entertainment centre. Combining history with business, it opened last year.

Today, HaTachana, spread over 20 hectares, consists of 22 renovated buildings housing restaurants, cafes, specialty stores and boutiques.

The freight terminal building in the HaTachana complex once handled tons of goods each year.

The train station

But the structures that particularly bring the Jerusalem-to-Jaffa line to mind are the train station building, the freight terminal and the railway tracks. The faux tracks, which accommodate two beige-white-and-brown railway carriages, lead nowhere and are strictly for show, designed to remind visitors of a bygone period.

Some of the buildings are foreign to the original site. One of them, the Villa, now a café, once belonged to Hugo Wieland, a member of the now-defunct German Templar community.

HaTachana, admission to which is free, is across the street from the municipal beach and adjacent to Neve Tzedek, the first Jewish neighbourhood outside Jaffa, which was once a bastion of Palestinian nationalism and almost exclusively inhabited by Muslim and Christian Arabs.

The Jerusalem-to-Jaffa line was the brainchild of British financier, banker and philanthropist Sir Moses Montefiore (1784-1885), an early Zionist who conceived the idea in 1838.

Palestine was back then a Turkish province, having been conquered by the Ottoman empire in 1517.

In 400 years of imperial rule, control of Palestine slipped out of Ottoman hands only twice. In 1798, Napoleon's army temporarily seized Jaffa, Ramle, Lod, Nazareth and Tiberias. Several decades later, Mehmet Ali of Egypt captured Palestine, but his conquest was short-lived.

When Montefiore proposed a railway line linking Jerusalem to Jaffa, Palestine was home to less than 50,000 Jews and Theodor Herzl, the founder of modern political Zionism, had not even been born.

Montefiore figured that a railroad would be a better way of transporting goods than the camel, the mainstay of transportation before the 20th century. The project, however, fizzled and Montefiore backed out. Construction costs would have been prohibitive and the Turkish sultan feared that a railroad would serve western rather than Ottoman interests.

The torch was passed to Joseph Navon (1858-1934), a Jerusalem businessman and member of the city's Sephardi elite. An Ottoman citizen, he aggressively promoted the project. After receiving a permit from the authorities, he joined forces with a French entrepreneur. When their funds ran out, Navon found investors in Switzerland, Germany and Belgium.

When Navon tried to enlist Herzl's support, he was rebuffed. The "wretched little line from Jerusalem to Jaffa was, of course, quite inadequate for our needs," Herzl claimed in a letter.

Undeterred, Navon pushed on, buying stock from Ferdinand de Lessseps' Panama Canal Company and recruiting engineers from Europe and labourers from the Middle East.

During its heyday prior to World War I, the line processed 43,000 tons of freight and handled 183,000 passengers annually.

Contrary to Herzl's belief, the line was of benefit to the Zionist movement in Palestine, prompting Baron Edmond de Rothschild, a Zionist benefactor, to build Jewish settlements along it.

From the 1870s onward, thousands of evangelical Christians from Germany, the Templars, settled in Palestine, creating flourishing colonies. The Wielands, a Templar family, established a brick and tile factory near the Jaffa station.

Hugo, the patriarch, built a one-storey residence in 1902 and added a second floor in 1906. His descendants lived in the house until the mid-1930s, when the generally pro-Nazi Templars were expelled by Britain.

The line was affected by hard political realities, having been commandeered by the Ottoman Empire and Germany in World War I and silenced by the first Arab-Israeli war.

After Israel and its Arab neighbours signed armistice agreements in 1949, the line lost its relevancy. Having been replaced by a terminal in Tel Aviv in 1950, the station in Jaffa sank into obscurity and decrepitude. But as southern Tel Aviv was gradually gentrified, real estate developers saw potential in the decaying station.

Five years in the making, HaTachana is now a place where you can grab a sandwich at the Café Tachana, savour southern Italian fare at the Italika B'Tachana, enjoy an ice cream cone at Vaniglia and sip a latte at the Café Greg.

If you're drawn to outdoor markets, you may like the craft fair on Thursdays and the organic fruit and vegetable market on Fridays. And if you're a shopper, you can wander in and out of eight elegant shops.

But above all, HaTachana takes you back to a gauzy era when locomotives belched black smoke and Israel was still a glint in the eyes of Zionists.

Sedaka finds letting up is hard to do

Marvin Glassman
Special To The CJN

Neil Sedaka, now 72, has sold more than 60 million albums during his 50-plus years in music, but he isn't resting on his laurels.

Instead, Sedaka continues to create. Currently, he is working on a musical based on his life in music titled Laughter in the Rain, which he hopes will debut in London's West End in 2012.

Sedaka, who will performing in Toronto on Aug. 26 at the CNE Bandshell, hopes the musical can shed light on his life and the music business, much like Jersey Boys did for singer Frankie Valli.

"You can call the musical "the Jewish Jersey Boys" because it is about my real life and Jewish roots. The story has a lot of drama that makes it more than a feel-good story," said Sedaka in a phone interview.

"My mother had an affair that almost damaged our family, and much is revealed about what was wonderful, and what was not, about working in the music business back in the 1950s and through the years. My songs are used to move the story along, and the musical ends with me going up on stage to perform the music of my life."

Sedaka is hoping the new musical will not suffer from poor reviews as did the musical based around his songs Breaking Up Is Hard To Do, which was at Stage West Mississauga in 2009.

Aside from this shoddy musical, the rest of Sedaka's life is a testimony to his talent and dedication to his career. Born in Brooklyn to Sephardi Jewish parents Eleanor and Mac, young Neil played classical music on the piano and was awarded a scholarship from the Juilliard School of Music by age 13.

His mother wanted him to be a classical pianist, but Sedaka preferred to write pop standards. At age 13, he teamed up with 16-year-old Howard Greenfield, who lived in the same Brighton Beach apartment building as he did. The duo wrote songs together until Greenfield's death in 1986.

"I always had the love of other genres, but back in the late '50s I was hired for these songs. Together with Howard, we wrote wonderful songs that endured, as did our partnership."

The hits included his signature Breaking Up Is Hard To Do, Calendar Girl and Happy Birthday Sweet Sixteen. The duo wrote hits for Connie Francis (Where The Boys Are) and other artists when Sedaka was no longer featured on Top 40 radio.

Sedaka and his family moved to England in the 1970s, and he found a reversal of fortune when Laughter in the Rain was released in 1975, followed by a ballad version of Breaking Up Is Hard To Do in 1976. His 1980 duet with daughter Dara, Should Have Never Let You Go, also became a hit. He was inducted into the Songwriters Hall of Fame in 1983.

Sedaka's family has been involved in all aspects of his music. He has been married for 49 years to Leba, who has been his manager for most of his career. Last year, Sedaka recorded the CD Waking Up Is Hard To Do with his two grandchildren singing backup, featuring his famed songs with lyrics made for children.

Sedaka paid tribute to his late mother by recording albums of classical and Yiddish music. His performances of the music from the albums drew raves in Chicago and New York.

"My mother would have been proud because she very much wanted me to be a classical pianist and I loved the Yiddish songs that she taught me."

Sedaka performs in concert at the CNE Bandshell on Aug. 26 at 7:30 p.m. The concert is free with admission to the CNE grounds. For more information, call 416-263-3800 or go to www.theex.com.

COMPETITION SEEKS DESIGN PROPOSALS FOR TRADITIONAL SUKKAH

Kehilla, the housing agency of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, invites architects, students, artists, builders and design professionals to submit design proposals to its inaugural Sukkahville design competition.

The aim of the competition, which is open to everyone, is to design a temporary, free-standing sukkah for the Sherman Campus near Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue during the holiday of Sukkot. Inspired by New York City's Sukkah City 2010, the competition challenges entrants to re-imagine the sukkah, the traditional temporary shelter of Sukkot.

A committee of judges will select five winning designs, all of which will be constructed on the Sherman Campus in time for Sukkot. Submission deadline is Aug. 31. www.feduja.org/EVITE/2011/2011_sukkahville/info.html.

The Devil's Double highlights face of dictatorial Iraq

The British actor Dominic Cooper plays the pathological Uday Hussein in The Devil's Double.

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff reporter

Lee Tamahori's riveting feature film, The Devil's Double, focuses on the bloody Saddam Hussein era in Iraq.

Eight years after the United States and its allies invaded Iraq and deposed and captured much of its Baathist leadership from Saddam Hussein on down, the country, plagued by terrorism, sectarian strife and political instability, is still a work in progress, to say the least.

Tamahori – a seasoned filmmaker whose credits include Once Were Warriors and Die Another Day, the 20th James Bond movie – zeroes in on Uday Hussein, the dissolute son and heir apparent of the brutal dictator.

Now playing in Toronto, The Devil's Double is based on a true story and is framed by two major events that rocked the Middle East in the 1980s and 1990s – the Iran-Iraq War, the longest ever conflict in the region, and the first Gulf War, which cut hegemonic Iraq down to size and subjected it to severe United Nations sanctions.

Uday (Dominic Cooper) is a thuggish and unhinged figure who favoured Cuban cigars, British and American liquor, German sports cars, Swiss watches and Italian tailored suits.

A sexual predator who frequented discos and preyed on Iraqi school girls and new brides, Uday behaved with a sense of unbridled entitlement. To Uday, Iraq was a family fiefdom. He was not delusional. His father ruled Iraq with an iron fist and brooked no dissent.

The Devil's Double refers to Latif Yahia, an Iraqi war veteran whom Uday chose as his body double. Yahia, played by Cooper as well, was reluctant to oblige Uday. But he had no choice but to obey his master.

After submitting to plastic surgery, Yahia was ready to play his assigned role. But he never liked it and sometimes bridled at the bit. Yahia was painfully aware that his boss was a certified psychopath.

Uday, who was killed by U.S forces in the summer of 2003, was indeed a piece of work. In this lavishly mounted film, whose cogent script was written by Michael Thomas, Uday lurks in practically every scene.

He laughs maniacally. He sadistically tortures Iraqi athletes who underperform. He picks and chooses attractive women to satisfy his lust. He drives around in a car on the prowl for virgins. He rapes a new bride, grabbing her at her marriage ceremony.

In a moment of volcanic rage and possible folly, he murders his father's unquestionably loyal valet and food taster, spilling his organs with a curved dagger and finishing him off with a gun blast to the head.

This grisly incident underscored Uday's problematic relationship with his father (played by Philip Quast) and anyone else who dealt with him, including his girlfriend, Sarrab (Ludivine Sagnier).

Thanks in no small measure to Tamahori's able direction, The Devil's Double successfully recreates the visceral atmosphere of fear that pervaded Iraqi society during this black period.

Dominic Cooper, a British actor, delivers a superb performance as both Uday and Latif, moving effortlessly between these two radically different characters.

If Uday was one of the faces of Iraq in the late 20th and early 21st centuries, Iraq was surely governed by the devil.

Oldest tennis player beats youngsters at Rogers Cup

Marvin Glassman
Special to the CJN

At 33, American Michael Russell was the oldest player competing at the Rogers Cup tennis tournament held at Uniprix Stadium this month.

On the surface, it might appear that the player ranked No. 100 would be an easy victory for the younger athletes in the draw.

But, as three of his opponents can testify, Russell was not so easily dismissed. Russell, who is Jewish, showed his mental toughness in his opening match in the qualifying round by outlasting Toshide Matsui of Japan 6-4, 5-7, 6-4 in a gruelling three-set thriller.

The next day, Russell made quick work of 24-year-old Marsel Ilhan of Turkey 7-5, 6-2, outworking his younger opponent.

In the main draw, Russell continued to exceed expectations by defeating 47th-ranked Albert Montanes of Spain 7-5, 6-2, once again out-manoeuvring his 30-year-old opponent with guile and hustle.

"I feel good that I can still beat players who are both younger and ranked higher than me," said Russell following his matches, wearing a sleeveless shirt that exposed his muscular build.

Known as "Iron Mike" and "Muscles Russell" by his competitors, Russell is a fitness fanatic who made his opponents look like the seniors on the court.

"I saw what fitness did for Andre Agassi in his last years in tennis, so I knew that by staying in shape, I would be adding years to my career."

Russell could not out-hustle Swiss player Stan Wawrinka, who, at age 24 and ranked 17th, proved to be too difficult to conquer in the second-round match. Russell lost 6-3, 6-2 and served eight double faults in his loss.

"The last few years Michael has been playing some of his best tennis. He is an inspiration to a lot of guys, especially if you're 27, maybe not doing well. Michael is the example that you can have your best years in tennis after 30," said Wawrinka following his victory.

Veteran American tennis player Michael Russell credits his fitness regime for his longevity on the circuit.

Having turned pro in 1998, Russell's tenure has spanned the peak years from Agassi to Pete Sampras and Roger Federer. His name is not widely known because Russell struggled with knee injuries and played almost exclusively on the challenger circuit – the minor league of professional tennis – for most of his years.

"In my first six or seven years, I struggled more and did not have the same mental and physical fortitude that I have now. Since I broke into the top 100 in 2007, I feel better, stronger and have as much desire to compete as I ever had," Russell said.

Russell is the second-highest ranked Jewish player on the circuit – Dudi Sela of Israel is 92nd. Sela did not compete at the Rogers Cup.

Born in Detroit, Russell learned the sport from his father, George, a former University of Michigan tennis star. Like his father, Russell also excelled in collegiate tennis, winning NCAA rookie-of-the-year honours in 1997 playing for the University of Miami.

"I was raised, as are most Jewish people, not to forgo a university education. I'm happy I competed for the University of Miami and had a tennis scholarship. I have absolutely no regrets for anything over my career, and hope to still have a few more years left to compete," Russell said.

Adding to Russell's stability was his marriage in 2007 to Lily, a fitness consultant from Houston, Tex.

Russell's 14 years and counting on the pro tennis circuit are longer than that of most players, and even more remarkable given the depth of competition. Russell's highest ranking was number 65 in 2007, and he has played mostly on the major tennis circuit over the last four years. His best result in 2011 was a quarter-final finish at the Memphis tournament.

The only other Jewish player competing was 530th-ranked American Jesse Levine, who won his opening match over Ukrainian Sergei Bubka 6-4, 2-6, 7-6 (9) before losing 6-2, 6-1 to Favio Cappola of Italy in the qualifying rounds.

The Israeli Davis Cup doubles team of Jonathan Erlich and Andy Ram did not compete at the Rogers Cup as their ranking (number 52 for Erlich) was too low for entry.

Peer rebounds in Ohio

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel's Shahar Peer rebounded from her poor showing at this month's Rogers Cup with a second-round victory over Pauline Parmentier of France at the Cincinnati Open last week.

Peer, ranked 24th in world, had been due to play world number 3 Victoria Azarenka, but she pulled out due to a "right hand strain" just hours before the match was to start.

Parmentier, ranked 35 spots below Peer, turned out to be a much easier opponent, with Peer winning in straight sets 6-2, 6-3. Next for Peer was China's Shuai Peng, 15th in the world.

The two have met three times in the past, with Peer winning their last two encounters.
